Foreword: Zen and Zarathustra – Crossing Paths to Transformation

Before we move on to the heart of our investigation, it is necessary to clarify, with rigor and precision, two great spiritual archetypes that will be our companions: the Zen master and Zarathustra. Each represents a radically different way of approaching existence, suffering, and the possibility of transformation. And yet their differences are as instructive as their unexpected similarities.

Zen is a tradition of Buddhism that grew out of the fusion of Indian thought with the Chinese sensibility of Taoism, and later developed fully in Japan. Its essence lies not in metaphysical doctrines, but in the direct and immediate experience of reality—a reality that is impermanent, empty of fixed substance, and radically free of concepts. The goal of Zen is enlightenment (satori), a sudden awakening to the true nature of existence, which is beyond language and intellect.

The path of the Zen master is marked by a paradoxical journey: he seeks the transcendence of all desire, but also the detachment from any desire for transcendence. The Zen master is not a prophet who imposes dogmas; he is a guide who often teaches through silence, gesture, and the sudden breaking of expectations. His journey begins with the profound recognition of the unsatisfactoriness of ordinary life (dukkha), passes through rigorous training of the mind (zazen, or seated meditation), and culminates—if successful—in a spontaneous, fluid existence, where every action is at once empty of ego and full of presence.

It is important to note that the Zen master's journey never ends in the heroic or epic sense that the West has so often romanticized. There is no final victory. The master, even when enlightened, continues to practice. He does not seek to leave a personal legacy, but to dissolve himself into the role of transmitting the teaching—not as knowledge, but as a direct impact on the being of others.

Zarathustra, the central character in Friedrich Nietzsche's book Thus Spoke Zarathustra, proposes a profoundly different — and, in certain aspects, opposite — journey.

Loosely inspired by the Persian prophet of the same name, Nietzsche's Zarathustra does not bring divine revelations, but rather a call for human self-improvement. Zarathustra's main message is clear and cutting: God is dead — and with this death, human beings must abandon inherited values, transcend herd morality, and create their own values. The ultimate ideal that Zarathustra proposes is the emergence of the Übermensch — the overman, the being who, instead of bowing to fear, guilt, or tradition, affirms life in all its contradictions and sufferings.

Zarathustra's journey unfolds symbolically and cyclically in the novel. He begins by isolating himself in the mountains, cultivating his wisdom away from men. When he believes he is ready, he descends to share his visions—but is met with ridicule and rejection. The people are not prepared for his truths. In the face of this, Zarathustra returns to solitude, but this time not to escape the world: he understands that true greatness does not require approval. His journey is marked by encounters with various allegorical figures—the last man, the superior man, the anchorite—each representing different forms of spiritual decadence.

The outcome of Zarathustra's journey is not a triumphant achievement, but a quiet affirmation. He overcomes resentment, even the need to be understood. At his peak, he becomes a force that simply creates and celebrates life, without needing to justify himself. He dances with existence—just like the Zen master, but through a path of Herculean effort and affirmative will.

Comparing the journeys:

- 1) The Zen master dissolves the ego in the present moment; Zarathustra expands the ego to become the creator of worlds.
- 2) Zen seeks the emptiness of the self; Zarathustra seeks the fullness of the self.
- 3) Zen abandons all heroic narrative; Zarathustra rewrites the heroic narrative beyond resentment and denial of life.
- 4) The Zen master dissolves into the world; Zarathustra shapes the world.

This profound tension—between the detached serenity of Zen and the fiery affirmation of Zarathustra—is what offers fertile ground for rethinking enlightenment, spiritual maturity, and the very task of living in a world where old gods have died and new meanings have yet to be created.

Thus, throughout this work, we will not take simplistic sides for one or the other. Neither Zen emptiness nor Nietzschean will, in isolation, are sufficient to deal with the complexity of contemporary being. We need to understand how Zen silence can temper Zarathustra's fury, and how Zarathustra's creative force can prevent Zen from becoming an abdication disguised as wisdom.

The question that will guide our reflection, therefore, is: how to walk the tightrope between dissolving into being and asserting oneself as a creator of meaning? How to avoid falling into either the nihilism of nothingness or the narcissism of everything?

We will explore this without promising easy answers—because for both the Zen master and Zarathustra, the true answer always lies in the living practice of existence.

Introduction: Zen and Zarathustra – A Meeting of Minds

The quest for enlightenment has taken many forms in different cultures, offering distinct paths to transcend the self and connect more deeply with the world. Among the most influential traditions are Zen Buddhism and Friedrich Nietzsche's philosophy of Zarathustra. At first glance, these two traditions seem to stand in stark opposition: Zen, with its emphasis on stillness, non-action, and detachment; and Zarathustra, with his vision of a voluntary, active, and creative engagement with life. Yet behind these apparent contradictions lies a shared desire for human transformation—a transformation that transcends the limitations of the ego and enables a more authentic existence.

The fundamental question this book seeks to explore is this: Can Zarathustra's ideas illuminate the blind spots of Zen Buddhism? Can Zarathustra's philosophy, with its emphasis on action, creation, and effort, offer a more robust model of enlightenment than the detached stillness advocated by Zen? By examining the intersection of Zen and Zarathustra, we will attempt to forge a new, synthesized vision of enlightenment—one that does not shy away from life's complexities and struggles but embraces them fully.

At the heart of this inquiry lies the tension between two distinct ways of relating to the world: Zen detachment and Zarathustrian engagement. Zen Buddhism, in its quest for enlightenment, teaches the practitioner to free the mind from attachment, quiet the self, and accept life as it is—impermanent, illusory, and ultimately beyond the reach of the ego. Zen noninterference, its refusal to oppose the natural flow of things, offers a sense of calm and peace that many find transformative. Yet this path also risks alienating the very world it seeks to transcend. The Zen practitioner can become so absorbed in inner stillness that he or she loses the ability to act in ways that influence the larger, often confusing, human world.

Zarathustra, by contrast, challenges this passive acceptance. Zarathustra's enlightenment is not one of stillness but of active becoming—of creating and affirming new values in a world filled with conflict and suffering. For Zarathustra, the will to power is not just an individualistic drive for domination, but the creative force that enables human beings to overcome the limitations of society, tradition, and even personal suffering. He urges us to affirm life in all its complexity, to embrace suffering as part of the human experience, and to transcend nihilism by creating meaning where there is none. Zarathustra's approach to enlightenment is not about detachment but about engagement—confronting the darkness of the world and shaping it into something more beautiful, more powerful, and more true.

At first glance, Zen and Zarathustra may seem irreconcilable. Zen practitioners believe that by letting go of all attachments—including attachment to oneself—one can achieve a state of enlightenment. This implies a form of non-action: a surrender to the natural world, to the flow of things, without interference. The ultimate goal of Zen is to realize the emptiness of the self and transcend the dualities of existence, where notions of good and evil, right and wrong, no longer prevail. To the Zen practitioner, these labels are merely illusions, distractions on the path to pure presence.

Zarathustra, on the other hand, would argue that such detachment is not transcendence but escape. To be truly free, Zarathustra suggests, one must assert oneself in the world, even in the face of suffering and chaos. Nihilism, for Zarathustra, is not overcome by retreating from it, but by confronting it directly and overcoming the nihilistic tendencies that threaten to consume modern life. Suffering is not something to be avoided, but embraced as part of the journey toward self-overcoming. Only through active participation in the world and transforming suffering into strength can one become a true creator of one's own life and meaning.

The gap between these two worldviews—Zen's peaceful nonaction and Zarathustra's fierce engagement—is not as great as it first appears. Both traditions offer paths to overcome the limitations of the ego and discover a more authentic way of being. Both ask the individual to transcend the ordinary, to rise above the fears, attachments, and conditioning of society. But while Zen achieves this through the emptiness of the self, Zarathustra achieves it through the fullness of the self—through a bold affirmation of life, even in its most painful and contradictory aspects.

This book will argue that the synthesis of Zen and Zarathustra offers a more comprehensive vision of enlightenment, one that incorporates both stillness and engagement, both detachment and voluntary creation. While Zen offers profound wisdom in its emphasis on the impermanence of all things and the peace that arises from the surrender of the self, it may fall short in its ability to address the complexity of human life. By incorporating Zarathustra's principles of self-affirmation, active engagement, and creative will, we can build a more robust and active model of enlightenment—one that does not retreat from the world but confronts it head-on, with compassion, wisdom, and strength.

Through this meeting of minds—the peace of Zen and the power of Zarathustra—we seek to create an enlightened, serene, and dynamic self that exists in harmony with the world but actively transforms it. The true enlightenment that the world needs is not that of passive withdrawal but that of active participation. It is a balance between detachment and engagement, stillness and commitment, that will enable the individual to face the complexities of life with grace, strength, and courage to create a more meaningful existence.

In the chapters that follow, we will explore how Zarathustra's insights can fill Zen's blind spots and how Zen's wisdom can temper Zarathustra's greatness. Together, these two philosophies offer a vision of enlightenment that transcends the limitations of either one alone, opening a new path for those who seek to become more than they currently are and to fully engage with the world as it is.

Chapter 2

The Zen Master and the Problem of Passivity

At the heart of Zen Buddhism lies the pursuit of enlightenment through stillness of mind and noninterference with the flow of the natural world. The Zen master, the living embodiment of this path, is the epitome of the idealized practitioner: someone who has transcended the distractions of the world, lives in perfect harmony with the present moment, and exhibits an almost supernatural detachment from the turbulence of existence. The Zen master embodies an approach to life often celebrated for its peace, calm, and detachment—but as we will explore, there are significant drawbacks to this form of nonengagement.

The ultimate goal of Zen is to achieve a state of awakening in which one directly perceives the true nature of reality—not as a series of discrete phenomena, but as an interdependent and ever-changing stream of existence. To achieve this, the Zen practitioner practices meditation ( zazen ), mindfulness, and koan contemplation to empty the mind of conceptual thoughts, abandon the illusion of self, and experience the present moment as it truly is. The Zen master has transcended the ego, recognizing the emptiness of all things, including the self. Thus, the Zen master is an individual who no longer clings to attachments, acts without attachment to results, and exists as a mirror of the phenomena of the world— unaffected , unperturbed, and serene.

While Zen's non-action offers a sense of inner peace and a direct confrontation with the illusory nature of the self, it also disconnects the practitioner from the disorder and contradictions of the world. To understand why this can be problematic, we need to take a closer look at the Zen master's detachment. The Zen master not only detaches himself from the mundane concerns of everyday life, but often adopts a passive stance toward the suffering and injustices that characterize much of the human experience.

At first glance, this non-interference may seem virtuous. After all, the Zen master, by not reacting, maintains calm in the face of adversity. This non-reactivity is essential in the Zen approach to achieving inner stillness, a state in which judgment and attachment no longer cloud perception. But herein lies the critical problem: non-action, when it becomes rigid dogma, can turn into passivity, and this passivity can become an obstacle to engaging with the true needs of the world.

For example, a Zen master's non-interference in the face of evil, oppression, or suffering may inadvertently preserve the status quo. The Zen approach seeks to eliminate the individual's inner suffering, but in doing so, it may fail to recognize that much of the world's suffering is not self-inflicted. It is often the result of systemic violence, exploitation, and injustice. A Zen master who simply observes and does not intervene becomes a passive spectator to these same forces. Non-action here is not neutral, as some might claim; it often protects existing power structures, leaving the disadvantaged to suffer unchallenged.

This problem of passivity was harshly criticized by Nietzsche in his writings, especially in The Antichrist, where he criticizes the ascetic and renunciatory ideal found in Christianity and, by extension, in other religious traditions that emphasize detachment from the world. For Nietzsche, withdrawal from the struggles of life does not mean transcendence, but rather a rejection of life itself. The Zen master's stillness is a form of escape, a refusal to confront the difficulties and contradictions of existence. By focusing so intensely on inner peace, the Zen master avoids the painful realities of life—but in avoiding them, he refuses to engage with the world in any meaningful way.

The consequences of this withdrawal from the world are particularly evident in the social and political spheres. While Zen practitioners can retreat into their own private worlds of tranquility and enlightenment, the world at large continues to be plagued by violence, inequality, and injustice. Zen detachment provides no tools for confronting these issues or for actively working toward change. The Zen master, sitting in silent contemplation, may be free from personal anxiety and frustration, but does this freedom come at the expense of mutual responsibility and shared action?

This is where Zarathustra's philosophy offers a powerful critique of the passive path of Zen. Zarathustra rejects the idea that the answer to the world's suffering lies in detachment. For Zarathustra, enlightenment is not achieved by renouncing the world but by actively engaging with it. He calls for a creative and voluntary engagement with life, a bold assertion of the self against the difficulties and contradictions of the world. Zarathustra's vision of enlightenment is about becoming—not retreating into stillness but moving forward into the world with purpose, strength, and the will to create meaning, even in the face of suffering.

While Zen seeks stillness and non-interference, Zarathustra's ideal is one of self-overcoming, where the individual actively engages with the challenges of the world and, through willpower, transforms them. Suffering is not something to be avoided or transcended, but something through which one becomes stronger. The Zen master, with his stillness, may be free from suffering on a personal level, but remains disconnected from the social and moral dimensions of human existence.

Zarathustra's critique of Zen, then, is not merely a critique of passivity, but a call for a more comprehensive enlightenment—one that includes not only inner peace but also active engagement with the chaos and complexity of life. This is the enlightenment that does not withdraw from the world but actively transforms it. It is the kind of enlightenment that does not simply accept the world as it is, but works to create a world more aligned with human potential and flourishing.

By incorporating Zarathustra's principles into the Zen approach, we can arrive at a more holistic and dynamic model of enlightenment. The stillness of the Zen master, combined with the active will of Zarathustra, can create an enlightened individual who is not just a passive observer but a creative force in the world—one who embraces suffering as a means of growth, one who transforms himself and his environment rather than isolating himself from it.

In this sense, the Zen master's ideal of non-action and detachment is not inherently wrong, but it needs to be revised. The world does not just need people at peace; it needs individuals who are peaceful and engaged—those who do not withdraw from suffering but actively shape the world around them. The Zen master, in his non-action, may have achieved peace, but he has abandoned the world. What is needed, as Zarathustra demonstrates, is not peace at any cost, but a dynamic peace rooted in the capacity to create, affirm, and transform.

The critique of Zen's passivity is not a rejection of its wisdom, but a call for a more engaged and active form of enlightenment—one that embraces the complexities of life and confronts them head-on. This vision of enlightenment requires a synthesis of Zen's stillness and Zarathustra's willing engagement. The world does not need more passive observers; it needs calm, determined individuals who can affirm their values and transform the world through active engagement with its difficulties.

In the chapters that follow, we will explore how Zarathustra's lessons can fill the gaps in the path of Zen, proposing a more comprehensive enlightenment—one that not only transcends suffering but actively engages with it, embracing it as part of the ongoing process of transformation.

The Power of Engagement – Zarathustra’s Vision of Self-Overcoming

In the previous chapter, we explored the Zen master’s ideal of non-action and the ways in which it can lead to a form of passivity that fails to engage with the complexities of the world. Zen’s emphasis on stillness, detachment, and non-interference offers profound wisdom, but it can inadvertently shield the practitioner from the harsh realities of human existence. In contrast, the philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche, particularly in his work Thus Spoke Zarathustra, offers an alternative vision of enlightenment—one that demands active engagement, creative will, and the transformation of suffering into strength. This chapter explores how Zarathustra’s vision of self-overcoming provides a dynamic model of enlightenment that fills the gaps left by Zen’s passivity, propelling us toward a more robust, active, and empowered existence.

Zarathustra, a central figure in Nietzsche’s philosophy, is a prophet of becoming rather than being. He teaches that enlightenment does not consist in achieving a static state of peace or detachment, but rather in constantly overcoming one's limitations, embracing the fullness of life, and asserting one's place in a world often marked by suffering, uncertainty, and chaos. For Zarathustra, enlightenment does not involve withdrawing from life, but rather engaging with it in a way that creates meaning from its inherent contradictions.

The idea of self-improvement is at the heart of Zarathustra's philosophy. According to Nietzsche, the human being is not a finished product, but a work in progress, constantly evolving, seeking greater strength, understanding and creativity. Zarathustra's central teaching is that we must recreate ourselves, transcending the limitations imposed by society, culture and even our own nature. The will to power , a key concept in Nietzsche's work, refers not to domination over others, but to the inner drive to grow, create and assert ourselves in the world, actively shaping our existence rather than passively accepting it as it is.

Unlike Zen's non-action, which seeks to free the individual from all attachment and control, Zarathustra's philosophy calls for active participation in life. For Zarathustra, the world is not something to be transcended but something to be engaged with, affirmed, and transformed. Enlightenment, in this sense, is not an escape from suffering but the ability to create strength from it. The will to power involves embracing the struggles, conflicts, and contradictions of life and, through this engagement, creating a more meaningful existence.

One of Zarathustra's most provocative insights is that suffering is not something to be avoided or transcended. On the contrary, suffering is a fundamental part of the transformative process of life. The key to Zarathustra's view of enlightenment is that we do not escape suffering, but rather use it as a vehicle for growth. Zarathustra's famous doctrine of eternal recurrence—the idea that all events in life repeat themselves endlessly, exactly as they unfolded—challenges us to affirm life in all its pain and complexity. He asks: Would you be willing to live your life over and over again, exactly as it is, with all its suffering and joy, over and over again, for eternity? The answer, according to Zarathustra, must be a resounding yes. To affirm life in its entirety—including its suffering, hardship, and contradictions—is to embrace true power and authentic existence.

This is where Zarathustra's teachings diverge from the path of Zen. While Zen advocates the cessation of desire and the liberation of the self as a means of escaping suffering, Zarathustra offers no such retreat. Rather than retreating from life, Zarathustra invites us to embrace suffering as part of our self-overcoming. It is through suffering that we are challenged, transformed, and ultimately strengthened. The suffering we face is not an obstacle to enlightenment, but the very means by which we transcend ourselves and grow. Zarathustra teaches us that the path to enlightenment is one of constant struggle, not of passive release in stillness.

In Zarathustra's world, the idea of non-action and detachment as ends in themselves becomes problematic. It's not that detachment has no place—indeed, there is much wisdom in Zen's understanding of the need to let go of attachment to ego and desires—but Zen's emphasis on complete passivity runs the risk of failing to engage with the world as it is. By focusing only on inner peace and non-interference, the Zen practitioner can ignore the call to create meaning in a world that demands action and engagement.

Zarathustra, by contrast, offers a vision of enlightenment that actively shapes the world. His model of self-overcoming demands that we not simply accept the world as it is, but that we transform it through our will. This is where Zen's passivity fails. Zen teaches that we must let go of our desires and attachments, but it does not fully address the need for resistance—the need to draw boundaries, make judgments, and act decisively in the world. Faced with the complexities of human existence—evil, suffering, inequality—Zen's noninterference can seem like a form of complicity. It is as if Zen asks us to stand back and observe the world's problems without doing anything to change them.

Zarathustra, on the other hand, insists that change and growth are possible only through active engagement. His model of enlightenment is forward-looking, a process of transformation rather than a static state of being. He challenges us to assert ourselves in the world, to create meaning through our actions, and to resist the forces that seek to diminish human potential. Enlightenment, in Zarathustra's view, is not the attainment of an ideal state of stillness, but the constant overcoming of limitations and the continual reaffirmation of life's possibilities.

The synthesis of Zarathustra's vision with the teachings of Zen is crucial. Both Zen and Zarathustra seek to overcome the limitations of the ego, but they do so in different ways. Zen calls for stillness of mind, liberation from attachments and desires, while Zarathustra calls for transformation of the self through active will and creative engagement. The danger of the path of Zen is that it can become too introspective, too passive, while the path of Zarathustra risks becoming too aggressive, too individualistic, and too disconnected from the reality of interconnection.

The answer, then, lies in synthesis: a dynamic balance between inner stillness and active engagement. Zen offers essential wisdom for releasing attachment and finding peace in the present moment, while Zarathustra's teachings challenge us to engage with the world and create meaning through our actions. The true enlightenment we seek is not that of escape from life, but that of active participation in it—one that engages with suffering, transforms it, and emerges from the struggle strengthened and inspired.

In this chapter, we have seen how Zarathustra's philosophy of self-transcendence offers an essential critique of Zen's passive approach to life. By embracing suffering, action, and creativity, Zarathustra offers a vision of enlightenment that demands more than passive immobility. It invites us to assert ourselves in the world, to create from chaos, and to affirm the full complexity of life. In the chapters that follow, we will explore how this active form of enlightenment can be integrated with Zen wisdom, leading to a more comprehensive and powerful vision of human potential.

The Zen Master's Blind Spots – Non-Action in the Face of Chigurh , The Dude , and the Old Man

In the previous chapter, we explored Zarathustra's philosophy of self-overcoming, where active engagement with the world, rather than passive withdrawal, leads to a transformative form of enlightenment. This active engagement can be seen as the antidote to Zen's often passive approach—which seeks detachment and stillness but can fail in the face of the complexities of the real world. In this chapter, we will delve deeper into the limitations of Zen's non-action by examining how the Zen master would respond to three distinct characters: Anton Chigurh , The Dude , and the Old Man on the Sidewalk.

Each of these characters presents a different kind of challenge to the Zen ideal of noninterference. They embody violence, apathy, and resignation, respectively—forces that Zen, in its quest for stillness and peace, would likely fail to adequately address. In contrast, Zarathustra's philosophy offers a more active and confrontational model of engagement, one that recognizes the need for judgment, resistance, and engagement with the chaos of the world. By examining how these three characters would interact with a Zen master, we can better understand the blind spots that Zen passivity leaves unchecked.

Anton Chigurh: The Face of Uncontrollable Violence

Anton Chigurh , the chilling antagonist of No Country for Old Men , represents a force of irrational violence and chaos. He is a man driven by fate, whose actions are indifferent to moral reasoning or personal consequences. Chigurh operates by a brutal and nihilistic logic, determining life or death by the flip of a coin, removing any semblance of agency or compassion. His violence is methodical and impartial, indifferent to the suffering of others. Chigurh is a figure who personifies absolute power in a destructive and uncontrollable manner.

How would the Zen master react to Chigurh ? In the Zen worldview, non-action is the supreme virtue. The Zen master would likely approach Chigurh with an air of detachment—accepting violence as part of the natural flow of existence, as something impermanent and non-dual. To the Zen master, Chigurh 's violence may not be seen as inherently good or bad, but simply as a manifestation of the moment, to be observed without attachment or reaction.

However, this response, while peaceful, can be deeply problematic. Zen's commitment to nonaction and nonresistance renders it incapable of confronting or neutralizing Chigurh 's relentless violence . The Zen master's lack of engagement may actually enable Chigurh 's destructive path , since there is no attempt to resist, challenge, or provide a moral counterforce. The Zen master, absorbed in the present moment, may see Chigurh as just another phenomenon in the world—but the victims of Chigurh 's violence would suffer without any attempt to intervene.

Zarathustra's philosophy offers a stark contrast here. Zarathustra would not passively accept Chigurh 's violence . Zarathustra's commitment to the affirmation of life means actively confronting the forces of destruction, even at great personal cost. Chigurh 's presence demands resistance, the drawing of lines that would not allow his violence to go unnoticed. Zarathustra's active will to power does not allow for passive withdrawal, but demands engagement—a decisive rejection of evil and a direct attempt to neutralize it. Faced with Chigurh , Zen's peace may seem insufficient; Zarathustra's will to power would fight back.

The Dude: Embracing the Purposeless Present Moment

The second character, The Dude , from The Big Lebowski , offers a very different challenge. He is a man who embodies Zen detachment, but without the spiritual depth that Zen teaches. The Dude represents a life of complete passivity, an acceptance of whatever happens and an embrace of whatever comes his way. While the Zen master may respect his ability to remain calm in the face of life's absurdities, The Dude 's detachment is not a sophisticated form of enlightenment. Instead, it is a form of apathy—an unwillingness to engage with the world or take responsibility for one's life.

The Zen master might look at the Dude and recognize something familiar—a person who lets go of attachments, accepts the present moment, and refrains from judgment. However, in the Dude 's passive acceptance of everything , there is no creative action or transformation of the self. The Dude 's life is unaffected by the world around him, and while this may offer him a kind of inner peace, it also leaves him unmotivated and disconnected from any greater purpose.

Zen, in its strictest form, might view the Dude as a model of detachment. However, this form of detachment is ultimately superficial, as it requires no moral or creative engagement with the world. Zen's passivity mirrors the Dude 's apathy , and the result is an ineffectual individual lacking purpose and drive. The Dude creates nothing, nor resists anything—he simply exists in a state of passive observation. The Zen master, following this path, may find peace, but this peace lacks the autonomy that Zarathustra demands. Zarathustra would see the Dude as someone who has avoided life's challenges rather than embracing them. The will to power requires active engagement—asserting one's will, values, and creativity in the world, not wandering aimlessly, as the Dude does.

The Old Man on the Sidewalk: The Ghost of Resignation

The third character, the Old Man on the Sidewalk, represents a different kind of challenge to Zen. He is a figure who has accepted the passage of time, sitting daily on the sidewalk, seemingly at peace with his fate. He is an individual who has resigned himself to life's disappointments and is content with his stillness. There is something profoundly Zen about this character's acceptance of his condition. However, the Zen master might also see the Old Man as a tragic figure—one who has given up on the possibility of change, growth, or engagement with the world.

Zen teachings advocate acceptance of the present moment, but the Old Man represents a more problematic resignation. His stillness and detachment may seem like wisdom at first glance, but they hide a profound lack of vitality. The Old Man's life is reduced to routine, to passivity. He is a ghost, a remnant of the idealized Zen practitioner, but without the vibrancy that life demands. The Zen master may see this figure as someone who has moved beyond desire, but the Old Man's existence is defined by his lack of purpose and engagement.

Zarathustra's philosophy would condemn this kind of resignation as an inability to live fully. The Old Man's passivity reflects a refusal to engage with life, to take risks, to create or affirm meaning. While Zen might encourage you to sit peacefully in your stillness, Zarathustra would challenge you to become more—to transform into a new form, to embrace life's difficulties, and to actively create a new path. Zarathustra teaches that we should never resign ourselves to existence, but rather create meaning from it. The Old Man's stillness is the ultimate avoidance of life, the inability to affirm the self in the face of the passage of time.

Conclusion: The Limits of Zen Non-Action

Through the encounters with Chigurh , The Dude , and the Old Man, we see the limitations of Zen inaction. While Zen teachings offer profound wisdom in terms of acceptance, detachment, and peace, they fail when confronted with the active forces of violence, apathy, and resignation. The Zen master's refusal to engage in the face of Chigurh 's violence leads to complicity; his passivity in the face of The Dude 's apathy allows for a life of mediocrity; and his silent acceptance of The Old Man's resignation condemns him to a life devoid of growth or purpose.

In contrast, Zarathustra's philosophy of self-overcoming demands that we engage with life's challenges—not run away from them. Suffering and struggle are seen as opportunities for growth and transformation, not as obstacles to be avoided. Zarathustra's path is one of active engagement, affirmation, and voluntary creation. Zarathustra's true enlightenment is not a still, passive state, but a dynamic, creative force that engages with the world and shapes it through action.

The Zen master, in his stillness, can find peace, but without the will to engage, without the strength to confront, he remains disconnected from the deeper needs of the world. A more comprehensive form of enlightenment requires not only peace, but also the courage to engage, to draw boundaries, to assert one's values in the face of chaos and violence. This is the true synthesis: a Zen that engages with the world with purpose, combining stillness with action, detachment with creative will. Only then can we truly transform ourselves and the world.

Rothbard 's Nonaggression Principle , Zen Nonviolence, and the Dangers of Passivity

In previous chapters, we explored how Zen's commitment to nonaction and passivity fails when confronted with the complexities of real-world situations. While this path can offer the practitioner peace and tranquility, it often neglects the active responsibility needed to engage and transform the world. Zen's emphasis on noninterference has significant limitations, especially when dealing with characters like Chigurh , The Dude , and the Old Man on the Sidewalk. But Zen's nonaction is not the only ideology that suffers from this dilemma. Another philosophy that parallels Zen's approach is Rothbard 's Nonaggression Principle (NAP) , a cornerstone of libertarian thought that advocates noninterference in the actions of others, as long as they do not initiate the use of force. This principle, like Zen's nonviolence, seeks to avoid aggression and promote a world of peaceful coexistence. But like Zen, this ideal of noninterference reveals serious flaws when examined in the context of real-world power structures, inequality, and human suffering.

Rothbard 's Non-Aggression Principle and Zen nonviolence through the lens of Dalrymple 's essay "The Flight from Judgment" . Dalrymple criticizes the modern tendency to reject moral judgment in favor of a false neutrality. This aversion to judgment, coupled with an inability to confront evil or suffering, reveals the dangerous consequences of philosophies of noninterference. Both Rothbard 's NAP and Zen nonviolence, in their purest forms, can leave the world in a state of passivity, complacency, and moral inaction, where the forces of destruction, power imbalance, and injustice persist unchecked.

Rothbard's Non-Aggression Principle: The Appeal of Neutrality

Rothbard 's Non-Aggression Principle (NAP) is often seen as the foundational ethic of libertarianism. At its core, the principle states that no one should initiate the use of force against another. The NAP seeks to protect the autonomy and rights of the individual by ensuring that coercion or aggression are minimized in society. In Rothbard 's view , society should be organized in such a way that individuals are free from state intervention and private coercion, allowing them to live in peace as long as they do not infringe on the rights of others.

At first glance, this seems like a noble and reasonable ideal: noninterference promotes individual freedom and sovereignty. Rothbard's principle encourages voluntary interaction, which would seem at first glance to avoid the dangers of violence and conflict. But this neutrality—the refusal to engage in any aggressive action, even in the face of oppression, imbalance of power, or injustice—can have profound and problematic consequences when applied to real-world situations.

For example, the NAP implies strict neutrality towards all actions, whether good or bad, as long as they do not involve the initiation of the use of force. This means that individuals and institutions with immense power, wealth, or coercive influence can operate freely as long as they do not explicitly violate the rights of others. Wealthy elites, corporations, and even state powers can exploit and perpetuate inequality as long as they do not directly initiate the use of force against others, keeping the system operating within the confines of the NAP. Moral judgments of right and wrong become irrelevant as long as there is no physical aggression involved. This creates an environment in which the status quo—however unjust—remains intact, as passive noninterference dominates any attempt to actively address or dismantle power structures.

Rothbard 's NAP becomes a moral passivity, similar to Zen's non-action, in that it refrains from interfering with systems of power, violence, and inequality, so long as there is no physical violence. The problem with this neutrality is that it legitimizes the perpetuation of oppressive systems—systems that are inherently violent and exploitative, even if the violence is indirect. Just as the Zen master might avoid engaging in Chigurh 's destructive violence or the Dude 's apathy, Rothbard 's NAP would allow the perpetuation of structural violence, so long as it does not turn into direct force.

Zen Nonviolence: The Ideal of Detachment

In Zen, nonviolence is a fundamental principle. The practice of Zen meditation encourages detachment from desire, attachment, and judgment, and emphasizes the importance of observing the world without becoming entangled in it. In many ways, Zen advocates a nonviolent way of life, in which one does not resist the flow of life but accepts it as it is. Suffering is seen as a natural part of existence, and the ultimate goal of Zen is to achieve a state of peace and tranquility, unshakable in the face of life's ups and downs.

At first glance, Zen nonviolence seems to offer a pure form of enlightenment: one that accepts the present moment, one that is untainted by the desire for control or power. Yet, as we have seen, Zen passivity can be deeply problematic. Inaction in the face of moral evil, oppression, or suffering is not wisdom but a kind of moral abdication. Just as the Zen master can sit idly by while Chigurh wreaks havoc, Zen nonviolence fails to draw a line in the sand when it comes to the forces that corrupt the world.

Dalrymple's essay, "The Flight from Judgment," criticizes this tendency to shirk moral responsibility, especially in a modern world where many have become desensitized to evil and suffering. Dalrymple argues that this moral flight—this flight from judgment—allows evil to persist because no one is willing to confront it. Whether it is the institutionalized cruelty of bureaucratic systems or the individual cruelty of violent characters, a society that rejects judgment ends up tolerating the worst elements of human nature. Dalrymple 's warning is clear: neutrality in the face of injustice is a dangerous stance, for it allows evil to grow unopposed.

Zen's nonviolence, then, becomes a reflection of Rothbard 's NAP , in that both philosophies eschew moral judgment in the name of neutrality. Both allow for passive existence, where the world's wrongs can go unchallenged. In Zen, the suffering of others can be seen as impermanent, a natural part of existence. In Rothbard 's world , inequality, power imbalances, and exploitation are treated as inevitable byproducts of individual freedom. But in both cases, this neutrality creates a moral vacuum, where evil and injustice can fester unchecked, and individuals who would have the strength to resist are trapped in a worldview that prefers peace to action.

The Danger of Passivity: A Call to Action

Zen nonviolence and Rothbard 's NAP both stem from the desire to avoid harm, minimize violence, and create a world where individuals can live in peace. But when confronted with the concrete realities of power, suffering, and corruption, both philosophies reveal a dangerous passivity. Nonparticipation in the face of injustice, inaction in the face of violence, and refusal to confront evil directly are not virtues; they are defects of courage and moral responsibility.

Zarathustra's philosophy, by contrast, does not shy away from judgment or engagement. He teaches that we must actively confront the dark forces in the world and reject that which seeks to oppress, control, or destroy. Zarathustra's will to power is not a call to domination but to creative resistance—to assert one's own values and vision in the face of global chaos. To retreat from the world and its injustices in the name of peace or neutrality is to surrender to passivity and complacency.

The world needs an active, engaged kind of enlightenment. The Zen master's stillness, if unchecked by judgment, fails to offer a true solution to the world's suffering. Just as Rothbard's NAP can allow imbalances of power to perpetuate, Zen's nonviolence can allow evil to continue unchecked. True enlightenment comes when we confront the world's chaos and suffering with purpose, courage, and a commitment to justice. The Zen master can achieve peace, but peace without engagement ultimately leaves the world in darkness.

In the next chapter, we will explore the importance of cultivating a more complex and varied basis for enlightenment—one that combines stillness with active engagement and recognizes the interplay between self and non-self, individual and community, peace and action. This is the enlightenment the world needs.

Chapter 6

The Enlightenment the World Needs – Cultivating a Complex Foundation

In previous chapters, we examined the limitations of Zen nonviolence and Rothbard 's Nonaggression Principle (NAP) . Both offer paths to peace, but they leave the world vulnerable to inaction, passivity, and rampant injustice. Zen, with its pursuit of stillness, inadvertently blinds itself to the active engagement that the world desperately needs. Likewise, Rothbard 's NAP , while noble in its intention to avoid coercion, fails to challenge systemic power imbalances or social injustices when those imbalances do not explicitly involve physical aggression. These neutral, hands-off philosophies, whether in the form of Zen detachment or Rothbard 's libertarianism , fail to recognize that inaction can itself become a form of complicity.

In contrast to these passive models of enlightenment, what the world needs today is an enlightenment rooted in complexity, multidimensionality, and active engagement. A true worldly enlightenment must be grounded in the realities of human existence, with all its contradictions, sufferings, and moral ambiguities. Enlightenment is not simply about achieving personal peace or transcending the mundane struggles of life; it is about recognizing the interconnectedness of all things and cultivating an understanding of how self and non- self intertwine . This form of enlightenment transcends the Zen desire to quiet the mind and the Rothbardian desire to protect individual freedom; it is a call to create a better world—a world that is alive and moral in its contradictions.

This chapter will explore the need for a richer and more complex basis for enlightenment—one that synthesizes the best aspects of Zen, existentialism, phenomenology, and the philosophy of Zarathustra. This is an enlightenment that, while valuing stillness and inner peace, also values action, responsibility, and moral judgment. This is not a simplistic worldview, but one that recognizes that true wisdom comes not from withdrawal from the world but from actively engaging with its complexities, suffering, and chaos.

Zen and the importance of active engagement

The Zen path to enlightenment is primarily about quieting the mind and achieving a sense of detachment from the self. It teaches that acceptance of the present moment—and the absence of desire or judgment—is the key to achieving true peace. However, this approach can often seem overly simplistic in the face of a world filled with injustice, inequality, and suffering. Zen teachings encourage the practitioner to refrain from judging, interfering, or engaging with the world in ways that might disturb the tranquility of their mind.

While this approach has undeniable spiritual value, it often lacks the complexity needed to deal with the realities of human life. True human wisdom consists not only in achieving inner tranquility, but in engaging with the suffering of the world and working to transform it. Moral engagement is not only an important part of becoming a well-rounded individual, but also a vital aspect of community building and social change. Enlightenment, if it refers only to personal peace, leaves the external world unchanged, even if you have achieved profound inner stillness.

Zarathustra, on the other hand, calls for engagement with the world on all levels—intellectual, emotional, and spiritual. His ideal is not to escape the world, but to face it head-on, with strength and will. He embraces suffering, for only through suffering can true transformation and transcendence be achieved. This is the kind of enlightenment the world needs: one that seeks to transform the external, not merely escape from it.

Zarathustra's Vision: Enlightenment in Action

Zarathustra's teachings present a radically different ideal from Zen. While Zen may encourage stillness and the acceptance of suffering as an inevitable part of life, Zarathustra teaches that suffering must be overcome, transformed into strength, creativity, and freedom. Zarathustra's will to power is not a call to domination, but to the creation of one's own values, to the active construction of one's own existence in the face of chaos. In Zarathustra's philosophy, enlightenment is not just about finding inner peace, but about engaging with the chaos of the world and creating meaning from it.

Zarathustra's will to power represents an active form of enlightenment—one that takes responsibility for the world rather than shirking it. His teachings focus on individual responsibility, on creation rather than mere acceptance. In this way, Zarathustra embodies a form of enlightenment that demands constant action and creative struggle to affirm life in all its contradictions. The individual seeking this enlightenment must not only confront his or her own fears and limitations, but also confront the evils, injustices, and suffering of society.

This kind of enlightenment does not merely accept the world as it is, nor does it run away from suffering. It confronts the darkness of the world and transforms it through the act of becoming. In Zarathustra's view, the path to true enlightenment is a struggle, not a passive retreat. To be enlightened is not to escape reality, but to engage with it, shape it, and affirm life despite its inherent suffering.

Phenomenology and Existentialism: Adding Depth to Enlightenment

Phenomenology and existentialism, both of which emerged in the modern era, offer critical insights into how the Zen approach to enlightenment can be expanded. Phenomenology, as developed by Edmund Husserl, emphasizes direct experience of the world and how we experience it, independent of our preconceived notions or metaphysical assumptions. By focusing on subjective experience, phenomenology fosters a deeper understanding of how our consciousness shapes the world around us. This focus on experience can provide Zen with a tool for deeper engagement with the world as it really is—not just as it appears in a meditative state.

Existentialism, particularly through the works of Jean-Paul Sartre and Martin Heidegger, provides an additional layer of understanding by emphasizing the individual's freedom to create meaning in an otherwise meaningless world. Existentialists argue that we are thrown into the world without inherent purpose or structure, and it is up to us to create meaning through our choices and actions. This emphasis on freedom and responsibility is crucial to the development of the Zen approach. The Zen tendency to move away from judgment and involvement can be seen as a form of distancing from the fundamental existential truth that we are responsible for our actions and the world in which we live.

When Zen integrates the existential understanding that freedom comes with responsibility, it can move beyond passivity and cultivate a more engaged and moral form of enlightenment. This more complex enlightenment aims not simply to quiet the mind, but to acknowledge the suffering of the world, confront its ills, and transform both the self and the world through conscious and moral action.

The Enlightenment the World Needs

Ultimately, the world needs an enlightenment filled with complexity—one that combines the stillness of Zen with the engagement of Zarathustra's will to power. This form of enlightenment must be grounded in reality, one that actively challenges injustice, power structures, and suffering. It must embrace both the self and the non-self, recognizing that individual action can transform both the self and the world. Enlightenment cannot be just about detachment or escape from suffering. Instead, it must be about creating meaning and value in a chaotic, unjust, and imperfect world.

This form of engaged enlightenment requires a balance between inner peace and outer action, between stillness and creativity, between nonviolence and the moral judgment needed to confront evil. It is not a static state of being, but an active process of transformation, embracing the contradictions and challenges of the world while transforming them.

The world does not need more Zen masters who shy away from life's challenges. It needs individuals who embrace those challenges, who actively create a better world through moral courage, creativity, and wisdom. It needs an enlightenment that embraces, that judges, and that acts. The world needs Zarathustra's enlightenment—not just for itself, but for the collective good.

The Ghost in the System: Towards a Post-Dualist Ethics of Presence

After reflecting on Thus Spoke Zarathustra , one comes to understand that Nietzsche's prophet, despite his greatness, is not without gaps and limitations. Zarathustra calls for the transvaluation of all values, for the leap beyond man to the Übermensch , for the annihilation of the herd in favor of becoming. Yet his journey is, perhaps inevitably, a solitary one. His compassion is vertical: he loves humanity only as it could become, not as it is. He shuns mutuality, despises pity, and exalts himself in a proud solitude. But what if, instead of encountering superior beings as he imagines, he were to encounter complex and spiritual figures, like Dostoevsky's characters?

In this imagined scenario, Zarathustra would encounter not the tragic heroes he contemplates, but profoundly human beings like Alyosha Karamazov, who carries faith without dogma, love without domination; Ivan, who carries the burden of reason without consolation; or even Raskolnikov , whose moral crisis is a reflection of a metaphysical abyss.

Each of these characters, though shaped by the monotheistic structure, embodies something that Zarathustra cannot achieve: mutuality within suffering.

Dostoevsky, even though he was the target of Nietzsche's criticism of monotheism, grasped something essential: solidarity, shared suffering, and unconditional love are not signs of decadence, but of spiritual depth. However, Dostoevsky still remains attached to the concept of God, not by logic or reason, but by a visceral need for something that keeps us from giving in to emptiness. He clings to God because, without this figure, the alternative would be terrifying.

By contrast, Nietzsche severs this bond with surgical precision. He kills God in order to free the future, but in doing so he creates a new kind of solitude—heroic, yes, but equally vulnerable to cruelty. By interpreting interdependence as weakness, Nietzsche fails to see that it may actually represent a deeper form of strength.

This is where Camus enters the scene – not as a reconciler, but as a lucid heir to human truths and wounds. From Nietzsche, he inherits the determination to face a universe without God and without illusions. From Dostoevsky, he acknowledges the weight of human suffering, without resorting to mysticism. However, Camus rejects the transcendence proposed by both, preferring a philosophy of presence: he believes in work, in everyday action, with full awareness of its futility. Dr. Rieux, Camus's reluctant hero in The Plague, embodies this ethic. He is a hero not because he proclaims it, but because of his refusal: he refuses to lie, to nurture false hopes, or to abandon the dying. He treats them not because it will save the world, but because it is the right thing to do. He represents the anti-Zarathustra – not isolated in his vision, but immersed in the sacred, yet banal, now. He is not a prophet, nor a mystic. Just a man awakened.

By contrasting Zarathustra, Alyosha, and Rieux, a triangular map of the human condition emerges: Zarathustra loves from above, Alyosha from within, Rieux from without. Zarathustra seeks transcendence, Alyosha seeks communion, and Rieux seeks truth through action. Each represents a form of spiritual seriousness—prophetic, devotional, and ethical—but only Rieux seems free of metaphysical intoxication. He has passed through the fires of nihilism and emerged not with answers but with fidelity to the present moment, without transcendental guarantees.

In this sense, Rieux may be the most spiritually mature, for he does not seek a return to conventional spirituality. His rebellion is silent, his compassion is anonymous. Zen would agree with this: Rieux acts without attachment to results, speaks without preaching, loves without naming. He is close to what Zen calls “no-mind.”

This is perhaps the most profound twist in the conversation: the entire Western existential crisis reveals not only the tragedy of the death of God, but the unworkability of the dualisms that made it necessary. Monotheism divided the world into two—God and non-God, soul and body, meaning and matter. Even after the loss of belief, this division continues to haunt the Western mind. Western thought remains trapped in a metaphysical architecture in which meaning must be stable, identity consistent, and logic absolute. Existential angst, perhaps, is not so much a tragedy as an implosion of this structure under its own weight of contradictions.

This is where the silent dismantlers: Zen and Taoism come in. They do not respond to the Western crisis; they simply refuse its terms. When the West asks, “Is this all there is?” they smile and answer, “What else could there be?” They dissolve the question, not with cynicism but with presence. In Zen, the koan is not a riddle to be solved, but a breakdown of dualistic thinking. Is A not not-A ? Of course it is not. Contradiction is not an error—it is the very texture of being.

Taoism, similarly, points to a reality unconstrained by Aristotle’s logic of non-contradiction. It recognizes that all things arise mutually, reverting into one another, flowing like water. It does not fear ambiguity; it celebrates it. It does not cling to the idea of fixed meaning—it breathes meaning. For these traditions, the West’s crisis of meaning is not a tragedy but a misunderstanding. The idea that we must seek a higher truth, a unique identity, or a final ground—that is the illusion. What remains, when that illusion disappears, is not despair. It is freedom.

So perhaps Rieux is not just a character but a symbol. He is what it looks like to live after monotheism, after dualism, after the collapse of the eternal idea. He does not recover ascending wholeness. He remains among the sick, among the dying, among the absurd—and chooses to act with dignity anyway. He is, perhaps, a Western bodhisattva in disguise, doing the work, one breath at a time.

Perhaps this is the overcoming we are groping for – not a return to meaning, but an experience of its loss with open eyes. Not a synthetic reconciliation, but a liberation. Not new gods, but old silences heard differently.

We don't have to become Zarathustra, Alyosha , or Rieux. But by witnessing them, by understanding their limitations and luminosities, we begin to sense the shape of a postdualist ethics: an ethics that honors suffering without being consumed by it, that acts without illusions, that remains tender without hope. It may not save the world, but it can allow us to remain in it—awake.

The Tightrope and the Abyss: Navigating the Decline of an Era

We live in an age of illusions: systems that present themselves as rational but operate on myths; movements that promise liberation but generate new currents; and leaders who present themselves as giants but are merely the tallest figures in a room of dwarfs. Beneath the noise of politics, economics and culture, a deeper struggle unfolds: the tension between those who submit to the inertia of the age and those who dare to walk the tightrope above it.

The Flock and Its Idols

Human societies have always been shaped by collective myths, but never before have these myths been so carefully crafted and yet so empty. The modern world is divided into warring tribes, each clinging to its own sacred narrative. One side venerates the past, mistaking tradition for truth; the other bows to the future, believing that progress is inevitable. Both are wrong.

The conservative instinct seeks stability, but often degenerates into stagnation—defending institutions that no longer serve life, venerating ancestors who would despise their descendants. The revolutionary impulse seeks change, but often degenerates into destruction—burning temples without the ability to build new ones. Neither side truly creates; they merely react.

What they share is a refusal to face the abyss—the terrifying reality that existence has no inherent meaning, that civilizations rise and fall not by divine design but by the will (or lack thereof) of those who compose them.

The False Gods of the Age

The dominant forces of this era are not rulers in the old sense, but administrators—technocrats, financiers, and bureaucrats who mistake control for mastery. They do not lead; they optimize. Their power is real but fragile, built on systems that demand perpetual growth in a world of limits.

The market, once an instrument of exchange, has become a deity—its priests preach the gospel of efficiency while ignoring the spiritual poverty it breeds. The state, once a means of order, has become a maze of petty tyrannies—its guardians enforcing conformity under the guise of justice. Among these, the individual is neither sovereign nor servant, but a confused hybrid: a consumer who believes he is free because he can choose between brands.

The elites of this era are not a true aristocracy. They lack the courage of conquerors, the vision of prophets, the creativity of artists. They are, instead, the most successful conformists—those who have learned to manipulate the system without questioning its value. Their dominance is not a sign of strength but of systemic decay.

The Crisis of Weakness

The decline is fractal—it repeats itself at every level. Weak leaders elevate weaker subordinates, fearing those who might outshine them. Institutions that once demanded excellence now reward conformity. Culture, once a battleground of big ideas, has been reduced to a marketplace of slogans and grievances.

The masses, on the other hand, are not oppressed in the classic sense—they are distracted. Offered bread and circuses in digital form, they mistake comfort for freedom. When they rebel, their revolts are quickly commodified, their anger channeled into dead-end ideologies that change nothing. The system is too smart to simply crush dissent; it absorbs it, dilutes it, and sells it back as fashion.

At the heart of this malaise is a denial of responsibility. It is easier to blame shadowy elites than to admit one's own complacency. It is easier to demand salvation from institutions than to forge an independent existence. The great implicit truth is that no conspiracy, however complex, is as powerful as the human capacity for submission.

The Tightrope Walker

In this context, the only truly meaningful stance is that of the tightrope walker – the figure who advances without the safety of a net, who balances himself not by rigid dogmas but by continuous adjustments. This is not a middle path between extremes, but a transcendence of them.

The tightrope walker understands that:

- 1) Tradition is not law, but raw material – part of it precious, part of it poisonous.

- 2) Progress is not inevitable, but a choice – one that requires discernment, not blind faith.
- 3) Power is not inherently corrupting, but the weak are corrupted by it – because they fear what they cannot control.

This path is neither left nor right, but vertical – an upward movement, away from the petty wars of the age. It demands ruthless honesty: the ability to see through illusions without despair, to act without guarantees, to create values rather than inherit them.

The Spiritual Core

What is missing from modern discourse is the recognition that all great struggles are, at their root, spiritual. Economic debates, political confrontations, culture wars – these are superficial symptoms of a deeper crisis of meaning.

The materialist mindset—the belief that reality is only what can be measured—has created a world rich in data but hungry for wisdom. Fact-hunters ignore that human beings are not only rational but also myth-making creatures; sentiment-hunters ignore that not all myths are created equal—some uplift, while others enslave.

True navigation in this world requires what the ancients called phronesis —practical wisdom, the ability to discern the right action in the moment, without rigid rules. This is not a skill that can be taught in schools or legislated by governments. It is acquired through trial, through the kind of experience from which modern life increasingly insulates us.

The Choice That Arises

The systems of this age will not endure. The financial pyramids, the bureaucratic empires, the hollowed-out cultures—they are all already cracking under their own weight. The question is not whether they will fall, but what will come next.

Will it be chaos? Maybe. But chaos is also an opportunity – a chance to rebuild on foundations that are not illusions. The future belongs to those who can do three things:

- 1) See through the lies of the time without falling into cynicism.
- 2) Act without the need for external validation.
- 3) Create in the face of the absurd.

This is the path of the tightrope walker – the one who moves forward while others argue about the “right” direction. The abyss below is real, but so is the possibility of ascent. The choice, as always, is ours.

Chapter 9

The Synthesis – A New Enlightenment for the World

As we approach the conclusion of this exploration, we find ourselves at a crossroads where the paths of Zen and Zarathustra converge. This meeting of minds, which encompasses a vast spectrum of ideas and philosophies, reveals not a mere clash but a dynamic tension that points toward a deeper and more complex enlightenment. An enlightenment that is neither passive nor distant, but alive, engaged, and responsible.

In our analysis, we have seen how Zen, in its pursuit of stillness, risks detachment—an escape from the very challenges and suffering that make us human. Zen's nonviolence, while admirable, can inadvertently contribute to inertia, leaving individuals and societies without the necessary challenges to injustice and suffering. On the other hand, Zarathustra's active engagement with the world, while profound in its call for creation and transformation, can sometimes veer into an overemphasis on individualism and willpower, leaving little room for the vulnerability and mutual responsibility that collective enlightenment requires.

Throughout this book, we have sought to illuminate these blind spots, recognizing that neither the Zen nor the Zarathustra approach is sufficient on its own. The world as it stands today requires an enlightenment that is both active and contemplative, that engages with suffering and injustice while also embracing the stillness and peace of inner transformation. This is the enlightenment the world needs—an enlightenment that transcends the simplistic dichotomies of self and non-self, stillness and action, individual and collective. It is an enlightenment that weaves these threads together into a tapestry rich in complexity and full of potential.

More Complex Lighting

As we have seen, Zen offers us the wisdom of stillness and acceptance, teaching us the importance of letting go of attachment and ego. But when this philosophy is taken too far, it can lead to a passivity that ignores the moral and existential demands of the world. Zen's non-interference becomes a barrier, preventing the practitioner from actively confronting the injustices and suffering that exist in society. It is here that Zarathustra's will to power provides the missing element—a call to transform the world and take responsibility for one's actions. Zarathustra, for all his grandeur, points to the need for creativity, judgment, and moral courage in the face of a world that needs to be challenged and shaped.

Yet Zarathustra's philosophy is not without its flaws. His appeal to the Übermensch and his will to power can sometimes veer into individualism and solitude, neglecting our collective responsibility to one another. It is easy to see how a world dominated by a Nietzschean ethic can lead to alienation, division, and a neglect of mutual care. Here we find that the communal aspect of Zen—its emphasis on mindfulness and interconnectedness—can provide a much-needed counterbalance, inviting individuals to recognize their interdependence and shared responsibility.

At the intersection of these two philosophies, we find a new form of enlightenment—one that is neither purely individualistic nor entirely passive. Rather, it is an enlightenment that encourages engagement with the world in all its complexity and contradiction, while also valuing the stillness and inner peace that Zen so wisely promotes. This synthesis would not deny the realities of human suffering or the impermanence of life, but would seek to transform these realities through moral engagement, creative action, and shared responsibility.

Based on Phenomenology and Existentialism

To deepen this synthesis, we also turn to phenomenology and existentialism, which offer crucial tools for expanding the Zen approach to enlightenment. Phenomenology teaches us to engage directly with the world, to experience it in its rawness and immediacy, without the filters of preconceived judgments or metaphysical assumptions. This experiential focus can complement Zen meditative practices, offering a deeper connection with the world as it really is, rather than as we imagine it in our minds.

Similarly, existentialism, with its emphasis on freedom, responsibility, and meaning-making, offers a crucial corrective to Zen's passivity. By embracing the idea that we are free to choose and that we must take responsibility for our choices and actions, we move beyond the Zen ideal of detachment and embrace a more active and engaged form of enlightenment. In this view, we do not simply accept the suffering of the world but seek to transform it, to create meaning from chaos, and to act in ways that reflect our moral judgments.

This expanded understanding of enlightenment requires that the individual not only engage with his or her inner world but also confront the outer world. It demands a balance between stillness and action, between self and other, between nonviolence and judgment. The enlightenment we seek is not an escape from the world but an engagement with it—an engagement that is both moral and transformative.

The Need for Moral Judgment and Responsibility

One of the key insights that emerges from the synthesis of Zen and Zarathustra is the importance of moral judgment and responsibility in the quest for enlightenment. Zen, in its emphasis on nonjudgment and noninterference, does not take into account the moral demands of the world. While stillness and acceptance have their place, the world also demands that individuals set limits, make choices, and take responsibility for the consequences of those choices. Zarathustra's teachings, with their emphasis on the will to power and moral courage, point to the need for active engagement with the suffering, injustices, and contradictions of the world.

However, Zarathustra's philosophy cannot be fully realized without the interconnectedness and mutual care that Zen provides. The world is not just a battlefield for individual will; it is a shared space where our actions impact others. Therefore, an enlightened person must not only create meaning for himself or herself, but also recognize his or her shared responsibility to others, to the community, and to the world itself.

Conclusion: The Enlightenment the World Needs

In conclusion, the enlightenment the world needs today is active, engaged, and responsible. It is a form of enlightenment that combines the best elements of Zen and Zarathustra: Zen's stillness and interconnectedness, and Zarathustra's moral courage, creativity, and will to power. This enlightenment is not passive, nor is it just about escaping suffering. It is about confronting the world in all its complexity, shaping it through moral judgment, responsibility, and creative action.

The world does not need more distant Zen masters or more isolated Nietzschean supermen. What the world needs is an enlightenment that embraces both the inner and outer worlds, that affirms life in all its complexity, and that actively transforms suffering, injustice, and chaos into a more moral, creative, and just world.

This is the enlightenment the world needs—one that takes responsibility, engages with suffering, and creates meaning through the intertwined actions of self and other, of stillness and action, of Zen and Zarathustra. It is a philosophy filled with transformative potential, one that holds the power to change not just the self but the very fabric of the world around us.

Chapter 10

Principles

Create Meaning, Don't Wait for It

Explanation: Life does not offer ready-made meanings; we create them with our actions. Each decision, each act of courage or creation builds a unique purpose. Emptiness is not a condemnation, but a fertile ground for the art of existence.

Proverb: "The river does not wait for the path – it flows."

Fable: A sculptor looked at a rough rock and said, "I don't see anything here." A master took his chisel and began to carve it. "The shape is already there," he said. "You only need to carve it into the stone." Years later, the statue that emerged was admired by everyone.

Face the Enemy Within First

Explanation: Before you challenge the world, overcome your own weaknesses: the voice that delays, the addiction that distracts, the blind belief in saviors. The real battle is against complacency.

Only those who conquer themselves can face chaos without losing themselves.

Proverb: "He who conquers himself carries with him the greatest of all victories."

Fable: A warrior trained to slay dragons until a wise man told him: "Your greatest enemy lives within you." That night, he looked in the mirror and faced his own cowardice. At dawn, he dropped his sword. There were no more monsters to fear.

Act Without Certainty, Love Without Possession

Explanation: Demand clarity, but never total security. Move forward even without guarantees. Love is not about controlling, but about respecting the freedom of the other. Possession corrodes; only detachment allows people and things to reveal their true greatness.

Proverb: "The wind does not ask permission to blow, nor the flower to bloom."

Fable: A man tied a tree with chains to "protect it." When it died, the gardener showed him a forest where the trees moved freely in the wind: "Tough roots need no chains."

Power Requires Precision, Mercy Requires Discernment

Explanation: Force without direction is violence; compassion without limits is connivance. Act with the coldness of a surgeon and the generosity of a teacher. Forgive always, but trust only when there is proof.

Proverb: "The cook's knife feeds; the same blade, in the wrong hands, wounds."

Fable: A general spared a wounded enemy, but executed a traitor. "The first erred in loyalty, the second sold his soul. Mercy without judgment is poison."

Weave Unbreakable Bonds

Explanation: Loneliness is a trap, but the herd is poison. Choose the rare ones who laugh in the storm and fight without illusions. Build loyalty out of respect, not obligation. Falling together is a victory.

Proverb: " A branch breaks by itself; a tree stands firm in the wind.

Fable: Three travelers were crossing a desert. The first trusted only himself and got lost. The second followed the crowd and was devoured. The third chose two companions: one read the stars, the other found water. Together, they survived.

Take Full Responsibility

Explanation: No god, ideology, or leader takes responsibility for their choices. Freedom is a burden, not a relief. Every act has consequences; every omission is collusion. The world crumbles under the weight of its victims; those who rise up carry the future.

Proverb: "The axe does not blame the tree for the fall."

Fable: A young shaman prayed to end the drought. His grandfather gave him a bucket: "Fill it at the river and water the plants. Praying is good, but rain comes with the hands."

Wisdom is Greater than Dogma

Explanation: Theories are maps; life is a desert. Learn from mistakes, not from sermons. Listen to your body, read the signs of the world. Fools repeat words; wise people adapt, molding themselves to reality without getting lost.

Proverb: "The map is not the forest, and the sermon is not the life."

Fable: Two monks were discussing sacred texts when a peasant cried out, "My son is in the mud!" The first said, "Pray!" The second ran into the field and saved him. When he returned, he burned his books: "What good is knowing how to swim if you can't save a drowning man?"

Forget Hope, Move Now

Explanation: Waiting for a better tomorrow is postponing life. The present is the only battlefield. Celebrate every step, even in the darkness. Dance ignores the abyss – it transforms it into a rite.

Proverb: "The seed does not 'wait' to become a tree – it grows."

Fable: A prisoner was counting the days until his release. The jailer laughed: "Your cell never had bars." The man hesitated, then enjoyed the sun in the courtyard. He discovered that freedom is not a place, but a gesture.

Build, Don't Restore

Explanation: Nostalgia is a tomb in disguise. The past does not return; to imitate it is to create corpses. Identify what deserves to endure, but invent new forms. The future belongs to those who shape chaos.

Proverb: "He who rebuilds a wrecked ship forgets how to sail."

Fable: A village was rebuilding the same bridge that the floods had destroyed. A child suggested, "Why don't we build it out of stone?" The adults laughed. In the spring, the bridge fell down. The child went off and founded a storm-proof town.

Smile into the Abyss

Explanation: Emptiness is not appeased – it is mastered with grace. Take up the torch of awareness and the sword of action. Move forward without guarantees, but with style. Dying standing is the ultimate victory.

Proverb: "The candle does not curse the night – it crosses it."

Fable: A tightrope walker fell a thousand times before crossing the chasm. On his last attempt, he stumbled, but laughed out loud. The audience laughed along with him. The chasm was still there – but it didn't matter anymore.

Chapter 11

Virtues

The greatest mistake in the history of knowledge lies in the belief that to condemn joy could in any way be a truth or a virtue. Beauty laughs at virtue that seeks payment, that longs for heavenly and eternal rewards, and that is irritated by the absence of a payer. Sorrow lies in the lie that rewards and punishments are the foundation of virtuous things and souls. True virtue is being itself, like a mother's love, which does not expect to be paid for its affection.

There are those who see virtue in enduring imposed suffering, and this is given undue attention. Others define virtue as the alleviation of their own vices; when hatred and jealousy manifest themselves, their "justice" emerges. Some are dragged down by their failings, but the deeper they sink, the more they cling to an idea of redemption. There are those who, like heavy carts, talk much of dignity, and call their limitations virtue. Others are like clocks that need daily winding, hoping that their ticking will be seen as virtue.

There are those who are proud of their small justice and, because of it, cause great injustices, using the word "virtue" as an excuse for revenge. Some settle into their inertia, saying that virtue is keeping calm in the swamp, avoiding conflicts and accepting the opinion expressed. There are those who value the appearance of virtue, with gestures of adoration, but without real conviction. And there are those who believe in the need for virtue, but, deep down, only see the need for coercion.

Wisdom

Wisdom is the ability to discern what is truly good and valuable in life. It manifests itself as a clarity of thought that allows one to deeply evaluate circumstances, understanding not only what is right, but also the right time to act and the need to sometimes retreat. Those who cultivate it do not allow themselves to be led astray by illusions or selfish impulses, for they understand that true gain does not lie in actions that harm others, but rather in the integrity of one's own discernment. It is a fundamental direction for life, without which the noblest intentions would lack purpose and effectiveness. The resignation of those who have won and lost, although lucid and honest in admitting suffering, is incomplete if it does not affirm life in all its dimensions, without a smile that penetrates the pain.

Courage

Courage is defined as the calm and honest confrontation of conflicts and challenges that life inevitably imposes. It is not reckless boldness, but the willingness to acknowledge one's own vulnerability, to ask for help when one's own efforts are not enough, and to forge authentic connections that strengthen one's will. Through courage, one can pursue distant goals, even when the path is quite uncertain, and face obstacles with firm determination. This virtue is self-mastery, the firmness that allows one to resist exploitation and bad faith, and that gives one a voice to stand up against injustice or confront unethical behavior. It is the strength that transforms the noblest intention into concrete action, allowing one to become worthy of trust.

Moderation

Moderation, or temperance, is the subtle art of self-discipline, which seeks and maintains balance in all dimensions of existence. It teaches us to avoid excesses, allowing us to cultivate a sustainable rhythm that protects not only our physical health, but also the integrity of our mind and emotions. This virtue goes far beyond simple self-control; it is the ability to better enjoy each experience, transforming us into the master of our own desires, and not their slave. It is the profound understanding that contentment lies in the ability to live with what is necessary, and not in the insatiable search for the superfluous. Those who practice it protect themselves from the extremes that invariably lead to discontent. Therefore, moderation is the path to a full and harmonious life with nature, which respects limits, intensifies genuine pleasure when it presents itself, and leads to lasting serenity.

Justice

Justice is the unwavering respect for the dignity and rights of every human being, and is the foundation upon which mutual trust and peaceful coexistence are built in the world. It is not a mere legal formality or abstraction, but the refusal to place oneself above others or the rules, recognizing a fundamental equality in all, regardless of the countless inequalities of circumstance or ability. It demands that every decision made consider the well-being of all parties involved, and that one act with integrity and transparency. Justice is not something that simply exists passively; it is an active construct, forged by just people who dedicate their strength and character to its service, which involves resisting injustice both in the outside world and within oneself.

Epilogue

A Tribute to Thus Spoke Zarathustra, An Imagined Sequel Part V: The Silent Noon

Chapter I: The Descent into Stillness

Thus Zarathustra returned. Not descending like a storm from his mountain, nor shining like a sun demanding worship. He emerged from his solitude as stillness follows thunder, as the deep heat of noon follows the toil of the morning. The fire that had once forged his utterances had become a burning coal in his breast—steady, illuminating from within, asking for nothing. His feet touched the earth not with the hunger of the seeker, nor with the impatience of the teacher, but with the silent tread of one who remembers the path because he has become the path. The earth did not tremble, nor did the heavens trumpet his coming. Only the wind seemed to move gently away, making room for a presence that had grown vast as it became light.

His animals walked with him no longer as separate companions demanding attention, but as integrated currents within his own being. The eagle's distant vision was now the clarity of his gaze; the serpent's wisdom coiled contentedly around the hilt of his spine; and the lion, once roaring with the will to conquer, now lay beside the dove within his heart. They no longer fought. The lion had learned the quiet strength of presence, and the dove had found her courage in that stillness. They drank from the same inner spring. He carried his solitude not as a burden or a shield, but as a wide, luminous space within, vast as the mountain sky he had left behind.

Chapter II: Echoes in the Valley

He walked among the valleys and towns where his voice had once resounded like lightning. Men and women watched him pass—an old man, hair like a snowdrift, eyes fixed on the silent depths of mountain lakes reflecting an endless sky.

Some whispered, "Is that him? The prophet?" Others saw only an elderly wanderer. He sought neither recognition nor reverence.

Some, still burning with old fevers, approached him. One young man, trembling with desire, cried out: "Master! Zarathustra! Show us yet the way to the Übermensch !"

Zarathustra paused, his gaze neither stern nor pitying, but clear and comprehensive. He knelt down and drew a circle in the dust with his finger.

"The Übermensch ?" he said, his voice like the murmur of ancient rivers. "He is not a peak to be climbed after long torment, nor a distant shore. Look." He pointed to the simple circle. "He is not ahead, waiting for the end of time. He is here, in the totality of this moment. He is the step taken without looking down, the breath inhaled without counting, the life lived without running from itself. Stop fighting against and start being with. Walk like this, and you are already the bridge and the destination."

The young man blinked in bewilderment, holding dust instead of a doctrine.

Later, near a small village that smelled of bread and earth, artisans were working, weaving life with calloused hands. He sat among them, silent. One of them asked: "Old man, what is the supreme virtue? We strive, we build, we suffer - is the meaning only in the struggle?"

Zarathustra looked at his hands shaping the wood and clay. "To strive as if lacking is one path," he replied softly. "But perhaps the deepest struggle is to be fully what you are, here and now. The struggle was the climb; the arrival is the journey. The meaning is not found after the work, but in the loving attention given to the wood, the clay, the shared bread. It is the silent harmony that you weave into the fabric of the day."

He said nothing more, but his presence remained, a silence that resonated more deeply than his former pronouncements.

Chapter III: The Wisdom of Listening

He learned again. Not from books or stars, but from the rhythm of everyday life. He sat by the bedside of a dying man, a simple clerk whose neighbors spoke of his one beautiful achievement: a park where children laughed.

"What guarantees you this peace at the final door?" asked Zarathustra, abandoning the mantle of a prophet and becoming only a listener.

The dying man smiled weakly. "I sought greatness in forms that were not mine. I was lost.

Then I found a small gesture that rang true. I built the park. I did not conquer time, Zarathustra. I learned, briefly, to love my little piece of it."

Zarathustra remained, keeping a silence that was communion, until his last breath. He walked to the little park. A swing was swaying gently in the wind. He understood something beyond the Eternal Return – the unique and unrepeatable preciousness of a unique and finite bow.

He found an old woman talking to the wind, recounting sorrows, lost loves, unspoken forgiveness. "Have you made peace with all this yet?" he asked gently.

"Not everything," she sighed, her eyes filling with tears. "But what I could. The rest... I let time take me. Sometimes the deepest wisdom is to simply sit down when the pain gets old."

Zarathustra sat down beside her.

That night he dreamed not of eagles and lions, but of his mother offering him water, of a child with his own eyes asking him to fix a broken toy. He cried in his sleep, not tears of despair but of relief. The hardness within him, the lonely pride, softened into something akin to grace. He remembered asking forgiveness from a blind man he had once yelled at, not with an explanation but with a simple touch and the words, “I am sorry.”

Chapter IV: The Laughing Lion, The Circling Doves

His truth no longer needed thunder. It breathed in his stillness, shone in his welcoming gaze. He was the noonday that does not burn but fully illuminates, the integration of storm and calm. The Will to Power was not vanquished but transmuted: no longer the impulse to dominate, but the joyful affirmation of becoming, the creative force that embraces even finitude.

The lion within him was laughing now—not the laugh of contempt, but the deep, resonant laugh of one who has outgrown the need to overcome, who finds power in presence, strength in stillness. And the doves, no longer symbols of a distant peace but embodiments of an active harmony, circled freely, their flight woven into the fabric of his being. They were the peace found through mastery, not escape.

He no longer taught people how to break planks, for he saw that they were engraved only in the minds of those who felt trapped. He no longer proclaimed the Übermensch as an order, for he saw the spark of it dormant or awakened in every gaze that dared to meet his without blinking. His final work was not to destroy, but to maintain. To be a quiet space where others could glimpse their own potential for integration. His return was not a campaign, but a settlement, like water finding its level, becoming one with the landscape.

Chapter V: The Path Continues

Thus walked Zarathustra. He needed no followers, for he walked no path to another place. The earth is round; each step, when taken with completeness, circles the present. He offered no definitive answers, only his silent presence—a warmth that did not demand understanding but invited one's own company.

He disappeared from the sight of men, not into death or ascension, but into the very fabric of existence. He vanished like a shadow that merges not into the darkness but into the light that casts it.

He became the silence after the song, the stillness at the heart of the dance.

The world went on, seemingly unchanged. Yet for those whose inner ear caught the echo of its silent passing, a weight was lifted. Struggle was not denied, but seen within a greater harmony. Struggle was not condemned, but invited to find its rest in being.

Zarathustra goes on. Not as a man, but as the path itself. Not as a prophet, but as the still noonday. His final sermon was his silence. His supreme truth was his being. His highest creation was the man who returned, at last, whole, to the earth and to himself.

Thus was Zarathustra fulfilled.

Introduction

The world as we believe we know it is a web of illusions. The mind, eager for certainty, builds walls against the flow of life, and calls these walls "truth." This book is an invitation to tear them down.

At the heart of Buddhism is the perception of impermanence: everything that arises, passes away. No solid "I" inhabits this ever-renewing body, only a river of interdependent processes. To meditate is to let this reality unfold, not as theory, but as direct experience.

In the same sense, Taoism teaches that trying to master life is like punching the river: useless and painful. Water does not force its way, but reaches everywhere. Wu wei , effortless action, is not passivity, but harmony with the Dao, the hidden rhythm that moves all things. Water does not argue. It does not explain itself. It simply is: fluid, adaptable, invincible in its gentleness. It flows around stone without resistance, but in time it wears it down until it turns it into sand. It has no form of its own, but fills any container. It does not cling, but nourishes everything it touches. Such is the mind in meditation: when the struggle ceases, it finds its natural course .

Adding complexity to the understanding of self-transformation, the provocative Nietzsche, through Zarathustra, represents a challenge to all traditions, and proclaims, not as a celebration, but as a warning: without idols to follow, humanity must create its own values. He also teaches that overcoming lies not in the denial of the world, but in its total affirmation, which accepts suffering as a necessary part of greatness. Zarathustra demonstrates that there is no wisdom without fire, that fire not only consumes, but transforms. Fire is the indomitable will that says "yes" even to suffering, that radically admits the eternal return of all things, not as resignation, but as a radical affirmation of life. While water teaches surrender, fire demands the courage to burn illusions, to face the abyss and, still, create meaning.

Buddhism

Meditation

Meditation trains the mind to focus on the present, reducing internal and external distractions, and enhances the ability to aim at goals with precision. Rather than being an escape from reality, it empowers a person to navigate life's challenges with equanimity, easing the intensity of reactions, and promoting calm in the midst of turmoil.

Understanding the importance of the body in meditation is very important. Although the physical dimension can sometimes be neglected, randomly directing attention to different parts of the body has a remarkable effect on grounding the mind. This practice helps to unravel the illusion of separation between the self and the body. By focusing on the body, even randomly, we activate the networks that integrate sensation, emotion and attention. This reveals the deep connection between the physical and the mental, showing that the body is constantly renewing itself, in a dynamic and continuous flow.

More than a contemplative practice, meditation transforms the mind and body, increasing calm and clarity in responses. It strengthens the capacity for adaptation and remodeling, rebalancing internal energy and activating brain areas linked to focus and rational decisions. The practice also sharpens body and emotional awareness, reducing reactivity to stress by silencing the internal "voice" that generates wanderings and worries. In addition, it adjusts the "internal messengers" that promote well-being, while reducing those that cause excessive agitation. The benefits are vast, including the reduction of anxiety and deep sadness, improved attention and memory, greater ability to deal with stress, and decreased body tension, inducing a state of relaxation.

Several meditation techniques offer paths to awakening consciousness. Body-Focused Meditation observes bodily sensations without judgment, relieving tension and enhancing self-awareness. Deep Breathing uses the breath as an anchor to calm the internal system, revealing interconnection with the universe. Sitting Meditation, zazen , a classic practice, develops resistance to distraction and impulse control through observation of breathing and thoughts. Standing Meditation, through stillness, activates body alignment and energy flow, improving balance and patience. Finally, Walking Meditation integrates movement and mindfulness, focusing on steps to improve coordination, reduce restlessness, increase creativity and integrate mindfulness into daily life.

Mindfulness

Mindfulness is being fully anchored in the present moment, against the maze of future worries and past regrets. Through it, the mind frees itself from the habit of automatic reaction, allowing decisions to emerge from present conditions and needs. This practice cultivates a heightened awareness of one's own thoughts and feelings, without judgment, teaching one how to deal with them constructively. It develops the ability to bounce back from setbacks with greater balance, finding stability in the constant flow of existence.

Doubt and Awakening

To utter "this is true" is the tongue of fools who are stuck in their own ways. They, in their narrowness, take their way as the only truth, and so, in their ignorance, call their opponent a fool.

The search for understanding lies not in certainty, but in the radical suspension of judgment, questioning what it truly means to live. It is an invitation to move away from abstract speculation, opening our eyes to the everyday objects of the world.

Great doubt, great awakening. Little doubt, little awakening. No doubt, no awakening. The quality of the question shapes the enlightenment obtained. The depth of doubt is intrinsically linked to the breadth of understanding. Asking questions sincerely requires letting go of expectations of an answer, accepting a condition of ignorance. To sustain this immediate perplexity requires a balanced, focused and inquisitive mind, without succumbing to the pull of certainty or denial. Walking this path is like walking a tightrope: the course is in constant oscillation.

To know oneself is to consider one's own condition from multiple perspectives. This encompasses birth, aging, illness, and death, revealing the nature of life. One who truly understands knows that he has been cast into this world and is subject to falls and illnesses, and that each breath may be his last.

Understanding suffering is not sentimental but realistic: it recognizes that one continues to encounter what one dislikes, to lose what one cherishes, and to fail to obtain what one desires. Understanding embraces the totality of what happens, accepting a life permeated by both pain and pleasure, by suffering and joy.

The Illusion of Permanence and Reactivity

The common belief that things simply “are” or “are not” fails to capture the nature of reality. When we observe phenomena such as a thought, a pain, or the tree in the yard, we realize that none of these things can be reductively defined as “being” or “not being.” They come and go, change and transform, slip and slide, flowing into one another. It is impossible, for example, to draw a sharp line that marks the beginning or end of a breath. Such distinctions are useful conventions, but they are insufficient to reveal how nature really works.

Buddha described the reactivity caused by greed, hatred, and confusion as like a fire. A spark ignites the flame, and the human tendency is to believe and indulge in it, fanning the flame. Physical pain, for example, can be considered a first arrow, but mental restlessness and anguish follow like a second arrow, unnecessarily amplifying the original suffering and triggering harmful thoughts.

The cessation of reactivity can be compared to the sudden opening of a space within one's experience, a door that may have always been there but is often blocked and hidden. The more one understands the precarious and mysterious situation of life, the more egocentric reactivity dissipates or seems petty and absurd. And the more one stops believing in the dictates of compulsive mental habits, the more the world tends to reveal itself in its truth. Letting go of reactivity is a natural consequence of understanding it.

Living with understanding is a way of being, a way of moving, dealing with conflicts, perceiving possibilities and engaging with others. It is not just about acquiring abstract knowledge about the mind or reality, but about awareness that permeates every moment, devoid of attachment, aversion and vanity.

The Void and the Nature of the “I”

To understand the emptiness of a person is to realize that the seemingly irreducible core of the “I” was never there. What one insists on calling inherently existent or intrinsically real is, in fact, that which must be denied. No matter how deeply one investigates, nothing in this world exists in a self-sufficient way, by its own intrinsic nature, or independently of everything else.

This can also be described as “non-self,” indicating that unless the fiction of a fixed “self” is dispelled, appearances will remain deceptive. Every single thing in this world, from the largest elephant to the smallest subatomic particle, is contingent on proximate and distant causes, on parts to which it cannot be reduced, and on words and concepts that make it intelligible within a specific human culture.

Understanding this interconnectedness and the absence of inherent existence can lead to more skillful and effective action in life, allowing for greater flexibility and less attachment to the ego. This facilitates alignment with natural rhythms and responses, making action more fluid and engaging directly with the present moment. Embracing emptiness helps one see beyond the illusion of a rigid “self” or an unchanging world, potentially reducing internal and external conflicts.

Dwelling in the Void

When one consults the early Buddhist discourses, emptiness is not approached as an abstract negation, but as a way of inhabiting the moment. The emphasis is on direct awareness and experience of the present moment, on focusing on seeing things as they are, without the interference of conceptual thinking, preconceived notions, attachments, or desires.

This practice, often incorporated into meditation techniques, cultivates a clear and immediate experience of reality, enabling one to act naturally and effortlessly. By perceiving and responding to reality directly, spontaneously and without distortion, actions can flow smoothly and harmoniously.

The Body as Knowledge

The famous "gut feeling" or following your intuition goes beyond a simple way of speaking. The intestine has a vast network of more than one hundred million nerve cells that work independently, directly influencing how a person feels, acts and even the decisions they make based on intuition. It is like a "second brain" in the body.

This wisdom that comes from the gut, which often seems illogical, may be linked to processes that the brain does not perceive at the time, and which receives a kind of summary of what the body has already felt and processed on a deeper level. Research shows that communication from the gut to the brain is more intense than the other way around. This changes the old idea that the mind is always in charge and the body just obeys. Often, the body already "knows" what is happening, and only later does the mind catch up with this information, finding an explanation for the experience.

The mind tends to wander, wandering through future concerns or dwelling on the past. The body, however, is always in the here and now. Emotions, decisions, and even the most complex ideas arise from internal sensations, such as heartbeats, digestion, and muscle tension. Focusing on specific parts, such as the foot or the roof of the mouth, breaks the automatic thinking and brings attention back to the immediate, concrete experience. Treating the body as a “robot” is a habit deeply rooted in culture. The practice of noticing areas of the body that were previously neglected subverts this view, revealing the illusion of an isolated “pilot” and the integral dynamics of the organism.

The Illusion of Separation

The carbon in the human body is made from stardust, and the iron in the blood was forged in dying stars. The mind constructs a separate self, but atoms are borrowed, and memories are continually reconstructed. In general, the entire body is constantly renewing itself in a dynamic process of continual recombination, and although some of its structures take longer to be replaced, the vast majority of its atomic components are replaced within a few years.

Every breath, every bite of food, and every sip of water is a cosmic exchange, a temporary borrowing from the universal flow. To breathe, eat, and drink is to accept the universe within oneself. To urinate, defecate, and die is to return to the cosmos what one has borrowed. These mundane acts reveal the illusion of separation and dissolve the boundaries of the body. Impermanence is natural, and transformation is inevitable.

Suffering, Acceptance and the Cosmic Perspective

Much suffering arises from the misalignment of the mind's model of self with reality: the belief in permanence, control, and separation. When one expects to be forever young and secure, panic and anxiety arise when the reality of aging or trauma sets in. Liberation comes from seeing self as a passing thought, suffering as a sign, and oneself as a verb, not a noun.

In scale, if the universe were the Earth, the galaxy of which the solar system is part would be a city, and the planet, a grain of sand. As for the trajectory of the human species, if it were represented by a 365-day calendar, writing and mathematics, considered fundamental today, only emerged in the last five days of the "year".

The Awakening of Consciousness

Truth manifests itself directly, revealing what is false and exposing the essence of being. Those who cling to illusions persist in deception and feed on pre-established concepts that are no longer valid. The experience of overcoming emerges from pain, not from ignorance. The recognition of a state of suffering can lead to a desire for liberation that, when processed, transforms into acceptance and, eventually, into a clearer perception of reality. Confrontation with one's own existence and acceptance of experiences is an indicator of integrity. The willingness to face internal and external challenges culminates in profound personal validation. Hesitation in the face of the possibility of reliving one's own life suggests an internal imbalance.

The awakening process is gradual, characterized by phases of recognition. Initially, there is the perception of pain or discomfort. Then, clarity about the situation emerges. Finally, it appears as full acceptance, devoid of guilt or the need for external validation. True overcoming does not lie in the denial of finitude, but in the deconstruction of the narratives that surround it. People's fear does not lie in the end, but in the moment of clarity in which illusions dissipate.

Emotional expression is not a weakness, but an essential component of the process of clarity, which in its purest form represents a state of full awareness. Acceptance of one's own path, without external expectations, culminates in an unshakable affirmation of one's own existence.

He who is on his way is like the dawn: still cold, but promising warmth. He does not seek crowns or shelters, he loves his burden and laughs at his fall. In every pain, he sees a seed of power. In every solitude, a fertile soil. He walks without maps, but with the direction in his chest. He creates when the world destroys him, he expresses himself even among ruins. He does not ask for forgiveness for his strength, nor permission for his joy. He knows that everything returns, and yet he acts. He has not arrived, nor does he wish to arrive, because it is in the journey that he reveals himself who surpasses himself.

Such a person walks lightly, as if he had forgotten his own name. His eyes see without choosing, his hands touch without wanting. The world is no longer something to be conquered, it is simply what it is. He smiles at the wind, at the silence, at the stumble. Words escape, because truth no longer needs a voice. He rejects nothing, does not cling to anything. His mind is a still lake where nature rests in its entirety. He no longer wishes to leave the cycle, because he has never been outside it. He lives like bamboo: empty on the inside, firm on the outside.

Taoism

Wu wei : Effortless Action

Wu wei , which translates as “non-action,” should not be confused with inaction, but rather understood as effortless action, or action in harmony with the natural flow of the world. It means operating with minimal resistance, avoiding unnecessary struggles that exhaust the will. It is about trusting the process of life, being present and aware, responding to what each moment presents, and crucially, letting go of the need to control everything. It is about acting with clear intention and serenity, which allows for intuitive and harmonious choices, resulting in a significant reduction in inner conflict and a sense of ease in living.

This practice involves moving through life like a river flowing along its course: gently, adapting to the terrain without forcing its way, finding its way around obstacles. When one stops fighting the current and starts moving with it, solutions often emerge naturally. It is not a justification for passivity, but an invitation to take actions that align with the essence of the moment, without internal resistance.

Wu wei connects deeply with Buddhist views of emptiness. Understanding emptiness as interdependence and lack of inherent existence facilitates effortless action, as it promotes harmony with the interconnected and fluid nature of reality. By understanding that things do not have a fixed essence, it becomes easier to adapt without the need to force outcomes or resist what is. Similarly, understanding emptiness as the direct awareness of what is present also aligns with wu wei , as being directly aware of what is happening in the now allows for more spontaneous and effective action, free from the interference of mental concepts or biases.

Water

The highest form of kindness is like water. It benefits all beings effortlessly, nourishes everything without competition, settles in places that everyone avoids, and is therefore close to the Dao. Water does not compete, and therefore does not make mistakes. It shows the nobility of the Dao by acting without forcing, by remaining where no one wants to be, by always following the lowest path. Water has no form of its own, it adapts, flows, and bypasses obstacles without resistance, which is why it is invincible and is used as a metaphor for wu wei .

In life, it is good to be close to the earth. In the mind, it is good to have empty depth like a valley. Avoiding confrontation deflects accusations, competition creates opposition. The Dao does not depend on victories, it flows with what is, without unnecessary resistance. That is why it does not make mistakes, because it does not seek to dominate.

One of the central symbols of the Dao is the void that receives everything. The valley is receptive, silent, open. This is how the mind should be: not full of opinions or fixed identity, but capable of perceiving and accepting. The Dao acts without forcing, transforms without conflict.

When You Bend, Everything Fits

To bend is not to break. When you give in, everything falls into place. What is lowered becomes full. Emptiness becomes full. Weariness gives way to regeneration. Loss becomes gain. In little there is contentment , and in much, confusion. Simplicity and moderation are the heart of practice. Excess unbalances. The little, the essential, reveals the natural order. The Dao is the path of the minimum necessary.

The weak who yields are stronger than the strong who breaks. Winning by not fighting is the logic of the Dao. It is not about weakness, but about a strength that transcends conflict and thus becomes absolute. The Dao is in someone who does not show off, and therefore enlightens. He does not promote himself, and therefore becomes an example. He does not impose himself, and therefore achieves. He does not place himself above, and therefore leads. He does not dispute with anyone, and therefore no one disputes with him. This is the Dao in action: authority without domination, achievement without assertion.

The Dao is in those who, without arrogance, distinguish right from wrong. Without praising themselves, honor finds them. Without seeking a legacy, they leave something lasting. By giving up their self-image, they reveal who they are. By ceasing to exalt themselves, they remain. By renouncing dispute, they become unbeatable. The fluidity of opposites and continuous transformation reveal the non-duality of the Dao.

The Path of Aging

The way we age is profoundly influenced by our attitude towards life. When we live with autonomy and openness to change, aging manifests itself as a continuous process of self-discovery and evolution, with greater preservation of strength and vitality, both physical and mental.

On the other hand, passivity and conformism lead to stagnation and inertia, resulting in greater rigidity and accelerated decline. The inability to embody the fluidity needed to overcome the challenges of time is fully connected to these difficulties. An active stance promotes flexibility and a continuous purpose, generating a sense of accomplishment and acceptance of the changes inherent in life. Resistance to adaptation, on the other hand, results in frustration, isolation, and loss of purpose, and in an earlier general decline.

Chapter 3

Emotions

Emotions as Vital Signs

The act of feeling, of allowing emotions to reveal themselves, without masks or forced adaptations, often mistaken for fragility, can be the purest manifestation of courage. Emotions are not adversaries, but vital signs, and understanding them brings freedom and strength. Feeling is not a matter of control, but of understanding and processing. By accepting emotions, one assumes autonomy, and thus emotions do not dominate, but inform. Feeling is an act of responsibility, because by recognizing emotions, one can take control of one's own transformation process.

When we are taught to suppress emotions, with phrases like “be strong,” “don’t cry,” or “don’t complain,” the lesson is actually to deny our own reality. This is not discipline; it is self-betrayal. True emotional discipline does not lie in repression, but in the ability to discern emotions, recognize their impact, and choose how to react consciously.

Genuine discipline allows us to feel without being swept away by excess or denial.

Emotions should not simply be silenced or ignored. They warn, teach, and if properly understood, can guide us toward a more balanced and truthful state. However, this requires constant effort, patience, and a commitment to not run away and to act with integrity.

The adaptations forged throughout life to navigate adversity should not be denied, but acknowledged. Each defense, each "role" assumed, served the purpose of survival. The process of integration does not cancel out what has gone before, but harmonizes the past with the present under construction.

The body stores the emotional memory of all experiences, reflecting pain, fear, and sadness in ways that verbalization often fails to capture. However, it is the mind that needs to process and assign meaning to this pain so that it can be resolved. Ignoring bodily sensations is neglecting powerful signals that something requires attention. It is not about fighting what you feel, but about observing with courage, without rushing to "fix" it, and understanding that each sensation carries an essential message.

It is essential to recognize the right to feel, without falling into the traps of destructiveness or imbalance. This means being angry without being destructive, sad without sinking into pain, and fearful without losing your way. Feeling these emotions is not a sign of weakness; on the contrary, it is the essence of being genuine.

Emotions as Energy of Transformation

Emotions are not entities to be subdued, but intrinsic forces that drive. The belief that they must be controlled obscures their true nature—that they are invitations to reflection, questioning, and true action, that they are guides to a richer, truer existence. When misunderstood, however, they become distorted and distract from deeper personal purposes.

Anger signals a violation, a boundary that has been violated. In its highest form, it mobilizes the search for justice and the restoration of balance. This energy is not limited to destruction; it can forge significant social change or catalyze internal transformation. However, when devoid of understanding, anger degenerates into mere reactivity, erupting into aggression or internalizing as resentment. Such deviation not only erodes relationships, but also the health of the mind and body. The path to processing anger lies in recognition and reflection. Rather than an impulsive reaction, it requires assertive communication, in which frustration is expressed without attacking the person. Anger, understood in this way, is transmuted into a motivating force for constructive action.

Sadness is the guardian of mourning and acceptance of loss. It is the connection to essential vulnerability, allowing reflection on what was valuable and the redefinition of what is to come. Sincere crying purifies and opens space for new ways of loving and living. When avoided or prolonged, sadness can become chronic suffering. The imposition of not showing weakness prevents the pain from being fully experienced, generating emotional blocks. To process it wisely, it is necessary to allow the pain, express it in safe environments, and seek social connections. Sadness, then, reveals itself as a necessary path to healing and acceptance, enabling the resumption of life with greater depth.

Fear is an adaptive emotion, a warning sign of danger. It activates the ability to deal with challenges and maintains vigilance. However, fear can become distorted when it is based on imaginary scenarios or past traumas. In these cases, it paralyzes, preventing the exploration of enriching experiences, distancing someone from their potential. For healthy processing, it is essential to identify its origin and question its validity. Fear is not a sign of weakness, but an indication of the capacity to evolve and grow. By facing it with courage, insecurity can be transformed into an opportunity for learning.

Desire is a vital energy that drives growth, connection, and the fulfillment of purpose. It transcends mere material pursuits and is a force that directs us toward what truly matters. However, society often diverts authentic desire to focus on superficial aspirations, such as the pursuit of status or immediate gratification. Such desires do not fulfill us deeply and often treat others as objects, seeking validation or momentary satisfaction from them. Desire must be processed with self-awareness. The fundamental question is: “Does this desire truly resonate with my essence or is it a response to external pressures?” Reflection allows us to align desire with true growth.

Shame arises when there is a perceived risk of rejection or disconnection. It reminds us of social norms and group expectations. The underlying question is, “Am I still worthy of connection if I allow myself to be vulnerable and imperfect?” When internalized excessively, shame can trap us in a relentless pursuit of perfection and external approval. This cycle distances us from our true identity and prevents us from establishing genuine connections. Shame must be processed with self-compassion and authenticity. It is imperative to recognize its roots, questioning whether they stem from external expectations or limiting beliefs about who we are. Sharing vulnerability in safe environments helps to dissolve the burden of shame, allowing us to embrace our humanity and interact openly with others.

In the complexity of human emotional experience, each emotion has a vital function and, at the same time, a potential for deviation. We must therefore promote the healthy processing of these emotions, using them as tools for a more authentic, balanced and transformative life. It is not about running away from them or trying to control them rigidly, but about understanding their value and directing them towards our own and collective well-being. No emotion is "bad". What defines its impact is what we do with it. Ignoring anger turns it into resentment; stifling sadness turns it into apathy; fearing fear makes it grow. The way forward is to accept, understand and redirect.

Chapter 4

Zarathustra

The Fire: The Courage of Self-Transformation

In stark contrast to the abyss, fire represents the force that drives people to transcend limitations, to find meaning in the midst of chaos, and to assert their will in the face of suffering. Fire is what keeps us alive, what drives us to grow, to create, and to transform. It is the energy that fuels the quest for self-improvement, the burning desire to become more than we are, to forge new values in a world devoid of intrinsic meaning.

This fire, however, is not an easy force to control. It demands constant attention, continuous effort, and the courage to face the abyss head on. One must acknowledge one's fears, doubts, and uncertainties, transforming them into fuel for one's own growth. To keep the fire burning, one must continually fight against the pull of the abyss, resisting the temptation to succumb to the comforts of numbness and apathy. One must embrace the hardship, pain, and confusion of life, knowing that it is only through this struggle that we can forge something truly meaningful.

The belief that life is ultimately meaningless and worthless presents itself as a seductive force. It offers a seeming escape from the pain of existence, suggesting that nothing really matters. The abyss, in its purest form, can be a bottomless pit that swallows up all meaning and makes existence an exercise in futility. In moments of despair, it may seem easier to surrender to it than to continue the struggle against the inevitable suffering that accompanies life. It seduces as a freedom from the burden of meaning, but this freedom is hollow. It is a passive freedom, one that leads to stagnation, to the extinguishing of the fire.

The danger lies in the intellectual and existential paralysis that the abyss causes. If everything is meaningless, what is the purpose of any effort? Why fight against it, why persist in the battle against suffering? In a world dominated by this thinking, the fire withers. The energy of overcoming oneself, the drive to transcend one's own limitations, is replaced by an acceptance of passivity, a retreat into apathy.

Yet this path is not inevitable. It is a choice, a way of responding to the abyss. It arises when we fail to engage with the complexity of existence, when we avoid confronting the contradictions and uncertainties that define the human condition. It is the result of avoiding the fire, of rejecting the struggle, of choosing comfort over growth. It is the ultimate consequence of denying the abyss and choosing to numb ourselves to its presence.

Ultimately, life is not about escaping the abyss, but about learning to live with it, to transform it into something that strengthens the will. The abyss and the fire are not opposing forces, but complementary ones. They are two sides of the same coin, and without one, the other would cease to exist. Living authentically is accepting both, moving with both, and using them as raw material for the ongoing process of overcoming oneself.

Life, in its truest form, is a constant struggle, a continual confrontation with the abyss and a tireless effort to keep the fire alive. It is in this struggle, in this dynamic tension between suffering and transformation, that meaning is forged. Surrendering to the abyss may offer a tempting escape, but it ultimately leads to the extinguishing of the fire. In contrast, active engagement with the abyss, the willingness to confront suffering and uncertainty, leads to the creation of something authentic, something vital. We must remember that the abyss is not our enemy. It is, paradoxically, the source of our greatest strength. And the fire, though difficult to maintain, is the key to our survival.

The Living Truth: Zarathustra and Spiritual Autonomy

Knowing the truth, in Zarathustra's view, transcends mere factual accuracy. It is having traversed the illusions that sustain life and yet choosing the truth with open eyes. Those who "cannot lie" have not passed this ordeal; their honesty is cold, involuntary, and sterile, devoid of the vital complexity that truth demands. Zarathustra understands that falsehood is woven into the roots of life, into myth, art, hope, and love. Dreams come before awakening, stories before philosophizing.

Every great truth must pass through stages of deception, even self-deception, before it becomes more than a sterile fact, before it becomes something to be suffered and lived by. He who can lie but chooses to tell the truth does so out of strength, not weakness, for he knows the protective power of illusion, the nourishment that myth offers the mind, and yet he consciously chooses to affirm the world as it is.

Zen and Zarathustra: Paths to Enlightenment

The Zen master, representing a branch of Buddhism, seeks the direct experience of impermanent reality, aiming to dissolve the ego in the present moment, without attachments to legacies or final victories. In contrast, Zarathustra calls for human self-improvement, the creation of one's own values that transcend herd morality, affirming life in all its contradictions.

Zarathustra's approach is an unceasing combat against the false, transforming knowledge into a war that burns away illusions. The Zen master, in contrast, sees knowledge as water, fluid and adaptable, able to see through things without resistance or the need to destroy. Both positions, however, carry their dangers: Zen can lead to disappearing into the absolute, floating above history, and Zarathustra can drown in intensity, endlessly yearning for self-improvement without rest or companionship.

The quest for enlightenment in both Zen and Zarathustra transcends the limitations of the self into a more authentic existence, though one seeks stillness and the other active engagement. Zen stillness, if left unmoderated, can lead to a withdrawal from the world and its injustices, running the risk of passivity. Zen “non-action,” when rigid, can be complicit in preserving things as they are, ignoring the suffering generated by humanity’s systems and structures, and failing to confront the true needs of the world. Zarathustra criticizes this passivity, arguing that enlightenment should not be an escape but an active engagement with life, allowing the will to be the creative force that shapes meaning amidst disorder.

The main tension lies in facing the fact that neutrality in a morally compromised system is not a virtue, but rather complicity. Not acting or remaining silent reinforces the status quo, transforming inaction into silent violence. Stagnation in institutions can be intentional, creating a vacuum that benefits the interests of a few and harms the majority. Someone who merely complies with the minimum is a reflection of this larger system, mirroring its disinterest. In this context, maintaining integrity becomes a continuous act of resistance against moral erosion and the temptation to conform.

Furthermore, it is important to keep in mind that in any organization, the pursuit of results often gives way to the enhancement of image and self-preservation, that individual success depends more on blind loyalty than on competence, requiring the suppression of personal values. Integrity, seen as a risk, marginalizes those who question the system through exclusion and overload, not through direct confrontation. The "sale of the soul" is rarely explicit, manifesting itself in small concessions and strategic silences that shape character. In corrupt environments, truth is devalued, and cynicism emerges as a survival tool, normalizing corruption by gradually accustoming members to the belief that it is necessary to "play the game" to have influence.

Zarathustra, on the other hand, teaches that enlightenment is not a state of static peace, but rather the constant self-overcoming that affirms one's place in a world of uncertainty. Will, for Zarathustra, is the inner drive to grow and create, actively shaping existence rather than passively accepting it, as a restricted interpretation of Zen might propose. In this sense, suffering is not something to be avoided, but a vehicle for growth. Zarathustra points to the challenge of accepting life in its pain and complexity, and that it is possible to desire and affirm the eternal return of everything. Passivity is ineffective in the face of uncontrollable violence; Zarathustra would demand resistance and an active rejection of evil.

The world needs an enlightenment that combines inner stillness with outer engagement, in a dynamic balance that challenges injustice and creates a better future through conscious action. This requires one to not only engage with one's inner world, but to confront the outer, balancing stillness and action, self and other, nonviolence and judgment.

Chapter 5

Fables

The Path of Emptiness

This story reveals the journey of a man in search of a way to live authentically, beginning his reflection from what is close at hand. He observes the village in which he resides, noting that, although empty of elephants, cattle and horses, gold and silver, multitudes of women and men, it contains only one thing of which it is not empty: a group of people. However, considering the noisy community, he seeks refuge in the forest, which he perceives as empty of any awareness of villages or people.

Thus he regards the forest as empty of what is not there, recognizing what resides there: this is what is here. Although the hustle and bustle of the world no longer disturbs him, anxiety persists in his new solitude. To overcome it, he immerses himself in progressively more refined meditative states: the expanse of the Earth, limitless space and awareness, nothingness, and the state of neither being aware nor unaware.

At each stage, however, he discovers that something within himself still creates discomfort. He abandons the deep states for a concentration without signs of the heart. Even so, he realizes that he is still prone to the anxiety that comes from having the sensory fields of a human body. He understands that, despite his abilities, his concentration is compounded and artificial, and is therefore impermanent and subject to cessation.

It is only at this point, having exhausted the possibilities of solitary meditation in the forest, that he realizes the futility of all these exercises, for they will inevitably come to an end. Having come full circle, this awareness of impermanence grants him the peace of mind he has been seeking. Knowing and seeing in this way, his heart is freed from the effluences of desire, being, and ignorance. But the story does not end there. He then reflects: without any of the anxieties due to these effluences, I am still prone to the anxiety that comes from having the senses of a body. This state of consciousness is empty of these effluences. What is not empty is this: the sensory fields of a living body.

The text concludes with the profound insight that to dwell in emptiness means to inhabit fully the space of sensory experience, but in a way that is no longer determined by habitual reactivity. Dwelling in this emptiness does not nullify suffering, but transforms the relationship to it. The point is not merely to understand emptiness, but to dwell in it. This practice brings one firmly back into the body, allowing one to open one's eyes and see ordinary things as if for the first time. As the Buddha instructed, to live in this way means that in the seen there will be only the seen ; in the heard, only the heard; in the sense, only the sense; in what I am aware of, only what I am aware of.

The Five-Armed Prince and the Inner Strength

A certain prince, after becoming the best disciple of a renowned master, was given five weapons as a prize. On his journey back home, he came across a forest haunted by a fearsome monster known as the Sticky-Hair. The villagers, in their wisdom, warned Prince Five-Arms: "Do not go into the forest. There is a monstrous demon called the Sticky-Hair living there. He kills everyone he sees!"

But the prince, with the self-confidence and fearlessness of a tiger, went on. In the forest he met the creature, as tall as a tree and of repulsive appearance. The monster roared: "Where are you going in my forest, little man? You look like a tasty morsel to me. I will devour you!" The prince, in his presumption of knowing and being all-powerful, replied: "Fierce demon, I am Prince Five-Arms, and I have come to meet you on purpose. I dare you to attack me! I will kill you easily with my first two weapons: my bow with poisoned arrows."

He fired an arrow, which merely stuck in the monster's hair, causing no damage. Fifty more arrows followed suit, falling harmlessly to the ground. Then the prince drew his sword, then his spear, and finally his club, but they all caught in the creature's sticky fur.

Then the prince said, "Have you never heard of me, Prince Five-Arms? I have more than just my five weapons. I have the strength of my body. I will break you into pieces!" He threw a punch with his right fist, but his hand stuck. So did his left fist. He kicked with his feet, but they too stuck. Finally, he struck with his head, which also stuck.

Tied to the monster at five points, the prince, however, showed no fear. Sticky-Hair thought, "This is very strange. He is more like a lion than a man. Even in the claws of a ferocious monster like me, he does not tremble. In all the time I have been killing people in this forest, I have never met anyone so great. Why is he not afraid of me?"

Because Prince Five-Armed was not like ordinary men, Sticky-Hair hesitated to devour him. Instead, he asked, "Why are you not afraid of death?" The prince replied, "Why should I be afraid of death? There is no doubt that anyone who is born will definitely die!" And in that instant, he understood, "The five weapons given to me by the great master were useless. Even the strength of my body was useless. I must go beyond the teachings, beyond my body, to the weapon within my mind , the only weapon I need."

The prince continued, "There is one small detail I haven't told you yet. In my belly is my secret weapon, a diamond weapon that you cannot digest. It will cut your intestines into pieces if you are foolish enough to swallow me. So if I die, you die! That is why I am not afraid of you!" In this way, the prince used his greatest inner strength in a way that Sticky-Hair could understand. He knew that this greatest of all weapons, the one inside his mind, was the precious diamond of his own intelligence.

The creature mused, "Without a doubt, this fearless man is telling the truth. Even if I eat a pea-sized piece of such a hero, I will not be able to digest it. So I will let him go." Fearing his own death, he released Prince Five-Arms. The monster said, "You are a great man. I will not eat your flesh. I let you go free, just as the moon reappears after an eclipse, so that you may shine pleasantly on all your friends and relatives."

The prince learned from his battle with Sticky-Hair that the only weapon truly worth using is inner intelligence, not the weapons of the outside world. And with this diamond weapon, he also knew that destroying life brings only suffering to the killer. In gratitude, he taught the unfortunate demon: "You have become a blood-sucking, flesh-eating demon because of harmful deeds in your past. You can only go from darkness to darkness." And further: "Now that you have spared me, you will not be able to kill so easily. Keep this in mind: destroying life leads to grief!"

Prince Five-Armed continued to instruct the monster, and in time the creature agreed to follow the Five Steps of Training. In his own way, Sticky-Hair was transformed into a friendly forest fairy. And when the prince left the forest, he told the people of the change in the former demon, who from then on fed the creature regularly and lived with it in peace.

The River and the Barriers

There was a wide, silent river that crossed the mountains and watered the valleys. It was not a noisy river, nor did it rush. It just flowed steadily and serenely, carving the earth with its constancy. Wherever it went, it made forests grow, turned mill wheels, and fed villages.

But one day, as he passed through a new village, he met nervous, vain men who were uncomfortable with the river. They did not understand its fluidity, its effortless strength, its uselessness. They felt small before it, and this angered them. So they began to build barriers. Small stone dams, mud fences, iron railings.

The river, upon encountering the first barrier, did not become enraged. It did not retreat. Nor did it argue with the men. It simply stopped for a moment and watched. Then, calmly, it began to infiltrate through the cracks. Where there was a gap, it passed through. Where there was soft ground, it dug through. Where there was resistance, it gathered strength until it overflowed.

And when he couldn't get through, he changed course. He took another path. He didn't complain. He created a new riverbed. Further down, the new course began to feed other fields , more fertile, more open, less petty.

The men of the village finally had their fences and dikes dried up. They tried to accuse the river of running away, of being ungrateful. But they soon realized that it was their own thirst that they had caused, by trying to control that which cannot be possessed.

Moral:

The strong do not fight the mud, they go around it.

The creator does not prove anything, he transforms.

Excellence does not require recognition, it flourishes where it finds space.

And if you don't find it, create a new world where you can run free.

In Passage: Zarathustra and the City of Contempt

Once upon a time, a wanderer known as Zarathustra, after a long journey, found himself back at the gates of a great city. As he approached, a noisy fool, known for imitating his mannerisms and words, jumped out in front of him. "O Zarathustra," the fool cried unpleasantly, with outstretched hands, "this city is a swamp for thoughts. Here great ideas boil to death, and the deepest feelings rot. Do you not smell the slaughterhouses of the spirit? Souls hanging like rags, turning into filthy newspapers! They jostle about aimlessly, jingle their gold, and are cold within, seeking warmth in vices, addicted to the opinions of others. There is a false virtue, skilled in flattery, seeking 'little stars in the bosom' to please princes and shopkeepers. Spit on this city of merchants and turn away!"

The fool went on talking and made a long speech. At last, however, Zarathustra, impatient, interrupted the fool and silenced him. "Enough!" he cried. "Your words and your ways have long disgusted me. Why have you stayed so long in this swamp that you have become a frog? Why have you not gone to the forest? Is not the sea full of green islands?"

"I despise your contempt," he continued. "You angry fool, I call you a grumbling pig, for your whining comes from hurt, not from love. Even if my words were a hundred times right, you would use them for evil, for your heart is one of revenge."

Thus spoke Zarathustra, and he gazed at the great city, sighed and remained silent for a long time. Finally he said: "It is not only this fool, but also this great city that disgusts me. Nothing here can be improved or worsened. Woe to this great city! May it be consumed by a pillar of fire!"

And as a farewell, he gave the fool this lesson:
"Where one can no longer love, one must – pass by!"
